Father Graham interrupted, saying that the church did not drive the Bible out of the schools; the purpose was to put in them the correct version of the Bible—the Catholic catechism.

Mr. Harley: "Exactly. Now I ask you is it just or right that we should introduce our Catholic catechism among Protestants, when we will not allow Protestants, who are in the majority, to use the Bible in the public schools?"

Mr. Chance, of Delaware, thought this was a fling in the wrong direction. They might favor Catholic schools, but they should not denounce Protestant schools.

Father Phelan frankly confessed that Catholics stood before the country as enemies of the public schools, and the reason, therefore, should be stated. He considered those reasons were embodied in the resolution.

They must say they would as soon send their children into a pest-house or bury them as let them go to the public schools. They were assured they would lose the faith. They were afraid the children who left home in the morning would come back with something in their hearts as black as hell.

Father Maguire said the public school system is a nuisance. The words in the resolution are none too strong.

Mr. Chance moved to submit the resolution, with instructions to report one favoring Catholic schools, which was carried by about a two-thirds vote.

The committee finally presented the following resolution as a substitute for the last one of the series reported by the committee:—

Resolved, That the system of State education now established in most of the States, by its failure to provide proper religious instructions for the young, and its enlightening the head to the entire neglect of heart culture, meets with our unqualified reprobation; that it unjustly taxes a large class of our people who cannot, without danger to the faith and morality of their offspring, avail themselves of its advantages.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

The attempt to force the Catholic catechism into the public schools cannot be opposed without absurdity by those who keep the Protestant Bible there. Throw out catechism and Bible both, that the nation may plant itself on the principle of SECULAR EDUCATION. When the Catholic Church dares to attack that principle, on which the welfare and very existence of the republic rest, she does it at her own peril!

THE WIDENING BREACH.

Perhaps there is no more striking characteristic of the times, in a religious point of view, than the general decay of interest in "theology." It has become very difficult to get a hearing, even in the churches themselves, on what are called "doctrinal" subjects. The great bulk of the laity, as a class, are exceedingly impatient of any preaching that is not predominantly "practical," and the most popular preachers of the day are those who lay their chief emphasis on religion as a means of moral culture or spiritual edification, of private improvement or social reform. The great scholars and theologians of the various denominations still command a measure of respectful attention, when they mount the pulpit and expound the framework of doctrine which constitutes the bone and gristle of the Christian faith; but this is by reason of their individual ability or acquirement rather than of a wide-spread interest in the topics of which they treat.

This did not use to be so. Time was when, especially in New England, there were multitudes in the pews who took a keen delight in doctrinal discussions, and were themselves adepts in polemical theology. Many a prolonged debate on—and all the tough old nuts of dogmatism which were so useful in whetting the tusks of controversy, has taken place in the shoe-shops and farm-houses of New England, even within the memory of the middle-aged people of to-day. But the time-honored doctrines no longer do much, if we can judge by our own observation and reading, in stimulating the intellectual life of the period. Men turn away with distaste and ennui from the subjects which filled the minds of their fathers and grandfathers. It is doubtful whether a controversy like that of fifty years ago between the Trinitarians and Unitarians, which turned on the right interpretation of the Scriptures, will ever again divide whole communities into hostile factions, or become a topic of general conversation among neighbors. The day for such disputations over "theological points" is passing, if not passed. Not that intellect is dying out; far from it. Intellect was never more keenly alive than now. But the discussion has taken a wide range; and it is felt instinctively that, instead of the special doctrines of Christianity, it is Christianity itself that is now under examination. On the one hand is an increasing interest in the "struggle for existence" through which theology is passing; on the other hand is an increasing disrelish for all theological discussion whatever. The laity are coming to look upon the churches as of use only in maintaining and fostering the moral life of society. The clergy alone perceive how closely the power of the churches to do this depends on maintaining and fostering the "fundamental doctrines of Christianity."

It is from this point of view that the late meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in New York has possessed its chief interest in our eyes. A marked divergence of tendencies on the part of the laity and of the clergy has struck us as increasingly evident.

On the one hand, the secular press, which fairly enough represents the average mind of the laity, whether in or out of the churches, has criticised the Alliance and its proceedings in a very independent sort of way, and pointed out the superior importance of practice as compared with belief,—of direct reformatory influence as compared with the maintenance of theological tenets. This manner of contemplating the great Orthodox Protestant Congress and its doings appears, for instance, in the following comments of the New York Sun: "The writers and speakers evidently have much more solicitude about what they and their fellow-men shall believe, than what they shall do. The Alliance itself, in defining its fundamental principles, mentions a long string of dogmas, such as those respecting the trinity, total depravity, justification by faith alone, the resurrection of the body, and the like—but not one word does it say about personal obedience to the divine laws and uprightness of individual conduct. And in the same manner the drift of its labors has been how to establish certain abstract theological propositions, and not at all how to build up the true kingdom of God. In the meanwhile the world is suffering and groaning under evils of all kinds, which professedly evangelical people aid in perpetuating quite as much as their heretical brethren." This is a quite superficial manner of judging the Alliance, though it appeals powerfully to the sympathies of the average layman. Nothing could be in fact more unjust than to suppose that the members of the Alliance were really indifferent to the practical advancement of personal righteousness or social welfare; but the great predominance of the clerical element in the Alliance brought out strikingly the divergence of which we have spoken above.

Hence, while the secular press has rather "snubbed" the Alliance for not giving more attention to practical measures of reform, the Alliance itself, true to the clerical instinct of its leaders, gave its first and chief attention to the defence of the theological interests of Protestant Christianity. They have enough insight to perceive what the secular press overlooks,—namely, the fact that the reformatory power of the Church as an institution depends on the unimpaired sway of its doctrines. No practical measures of reform (that is, such reform as the Church favors) can be carried out in the face of a deep and rapidly developing distrust of these vital doctrines. The motives to which the Church appeals lose their hold of human hearts in proportion as the doctrines that rouse them to activity lose their hold of human minds. Hope of heaven and fear of hell, love of the Lord Jesus Christ and hatred of all Antichrists (whether Romish or Rationalistic), are the motives employed by Protestant Christianity in redeeming the individual and the world from sin; and these motives become congealed in the presence of scepticism. With great fidelity to the logic of Christianity, therefore, and, judged by their own law, with great practical wisdom, the Alliance expended its strength in attempts to fortify Orthodoxy against the attacks of its enemies. This can be done in no way but by stirring up a renewed devotion to Orthodox tenets. The clerical instinct was unerring, when it led the leaders of the Alliance to give their chief attention to strengthening the intellectual or theological defences of their faith. What the secular press complains of as a defect was the chief proof of sagacity given by the Alliance. If salvation is what the world needs to rescue it from all evils, temporal and eternal,—if salvation depends on faith in Christ and the Christian gospel,—then nothing could be more "practical," in the Christian sense of the word, than to seek to protect this faith against the assaults of unbelief. The complaint of the secular press is itself a new proof of the deep-seated disease under which the Church is laboring; since the clamor for "practical" measures in the secular sense of the word (and of course the secular press employs it in no other sense) shows how little reliance is in fact placed on "faith" as the true panacea for the evils under which the world groans. The press, speaking for the majority of the laity, wants no more doctrines or "abstract theological propositions," because itself and its constituency have lost confidence in faith as the cure-all of humanity's distresses; but the Alliance, speaking for the clergy and the great body of church-members, wants the old doctrines re-invigorated because they have confidence in nothing else. So the breach between the Church and the world widens day by day, as is proved afresh by this last great gathering of Christian believers.

LINE UPON LINE.

The attention paid by the press of New York to the meetings of the Free Religious Association and the long notices of its last Annual Report, while showing an increased appreciation of the influence of the Association, show also a most remarkable want of ability to appreciate the significance of the movement it indicates. This is certainly not due to any want of explicitness, or emphasis, or iteration, on our part. This very iteration, and reiteration, is complained of as tedious, and is regarded as evidence of the deplorable poverty of our minds. Why will our friends in the camp of Free Religion, says one merry penman, talk so everlastingly about freedom, more air and light, the privilege of living out of doors? Why can't they give the word Liberty a short vacation, and send the overworked noun-substantive to pasture for a space, and refresh our mental vision with a new hobby-horse?

We answer, precisely because his points are not duly estimated. We are as tired of enunciating the word freedom as our neighbors are of hearing it—as tired as Garrison and his friends were of repeating the same word twenty years ago, and as the Southern slave-holders were of hearing it; but, like him, we shall use the word till it is more threadbare than it is now, a good deal, and shall not desist so long as there is any doubt of its meaning left. It is a good word, of old and honored lineage. There is excellent stuff in it yet, spite of the hard usage it has been submitted to; and, when we have done with it, others will take it up, speak it as if it had never been spoken before, and leave it fresh as when it was born. FREEDOM. That is our word,—our catch-word, if you will, friends,—our watch-word, as we will.

But freedom is only a condition, sapientia suggests. Freedom is not a law, a principle, a truth, an idea. We never said it was. It is for our intellectual neighbors and superior critics to insist always on principles and ideas. We, more modest, are content with preliminaries. Freedom, we frankly concede without further admonition from philosophy, is not a law (though St. Paul said it was), or a principle, or an idea, or a truth, or a sentiment, or a doctrine, or a postulate in theology, or a datum in science, or an entity in metaphysics; add any other specifications you please, and we will grant it is neither of them. It is simply a condition. But it happens to be a condition indispensable to movement, and, therefore, we venture to call attention to it; as Dr. Brown-Séquard might call attention to the atmospheric conditions which were injurious to the nervous system of his patient living in a particular locality. Freedom is simply a condition. So is air simply a condition of vitality, not the breathing apparatus, but the condition of its healthful play. So is light a condition of walking in the streets—not legs or motor nerves, not eye-sight or power of perspective,—only a condition, but a condition so vital that without it nerves and muscles would be of small service. The prisoner whose manacles are struck off, and whose prison gates are opened, merely changes his condition. He acquires no new limbs or physical powers; the conformation of his feet is not altered; in all visible respects he is the same individual. But the immediate result of the change in his condition is that he gets up, walks out into the day, greets his fellow-creatures, engages, if his "brother Christians" will let him, in useful occupation, rejoins his family, and becomes once more a live member of society.

Freedom does not create mind, but it is the condition of its existence. Language makes "breath" synonymous with "soul." An apostle makes "spirit" almost synonymous with "liberty." There is no intelligence out of liberty. Under liberty we are pretty sure of making available all the intelligence there is, and of indirectly stimulating more. Apathy and restriction go together. No doubt, the prisoner, just released from his bonds, finds walking painful; he stumbles, totters, reels, perhaps falls, and is incapable of lifting himself up. He had learned to shuffle pretty well; he must now learn to walk. The emancipation of mind will lead, by the same necessity, to development of mind. The breaking down of sectarian walls, the obliteration of dogmatical lines, would release thousands of intellects from cliques and denominations. For mind, as mind, is inherently active. Give it room, and it makes its way towards knowledge, as the plant towards light. The plant cannot go wrong; mind cannot go wrong. Men talk of the aberrations of reason; it is a contradiction in terms: reason is subject to no aberrations; they are caused by the paralysis of reason. Error is the fruit of thoughtlessness, not of thought; and thoughtlessness is due to the limitations of one sort and another, organic or artificial, which interfere with the exercise of intelligence. The assumption of finality on the part of the dogmatists of every school, liberal and "orthodox" alike, pens up in ecclesiastical sheep-folds many hundreds of cultivated, trained, accomplished minds, capable of ascending mountain-heights, and exploring new regions of thought, but new so wanted to the little round of their church-yards that they even dread the suggestion of fresh fields and pastures new.

That intelligence needs culture, education, knowledge, acquaintance with ideas, is true enough; but first of all it needs liberty. To offer truth to a mind in thrall to an institution, is much like inviting a prisoner to take a pleasant walk. That the prisoner does not desire a pleasant walk,—that his stiff legs enjoy his corner,—that his collapsed lungs prefer bad air to good,—is no argument against the superiority of a free social life.

The admirable Mayo, temporarily at Springfield, thinks that people have freedom enough; that the struggle for liberty in religion is closed. This has been his opinion for some years past. It is an opin-tion that the Paulist Fathers share cordially with him; the members of the Evangelical Alliance are of the same mind. There is a rumor abroad that the opinion is sustained by so high an ecclesiastical authority as the Pope of Rome. But they who live in unventilated houses have a predilection for foul air. If our friends will take a ramble in the woods some pleasant day, they may discover that all the glories are not hanging on their walls, nor all the flowers in their pots. They may be tempted after that, possibly, to open their windows—and make the refreshing discovery that they are more vigorous, more cheerful, and, if that were conceivable, more kindly and sweet-tempered, than they were before. AN OUTRAGE ON THE JEWS.

A Universalist minister of Dumfermline, Scotland, the Rev. James U. Mitchell, preached a sermon in Boston, Sunday, October 10, on future rewards and punishments, taking a tough text for Universalists to handle—"Then shall he say also unto them on his left hand, depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels." The speaker declared that Universalists are "not of those who believe in one part of the Scriptures and reject another;" therefore he was bound to make his text square with his dogma, even if he had to treat it like a mad dog and amputate its tail just behind the ears. How did he get over one of the plainest texts in the Bible? Why, he made the "cursed" mean the Jews, and nobody else, adding:—

"The curse which was then pronounced on that stiff-necked nation has clung to them to this day; they were once the favored people of God, and now they are outcasts, for they abused the privileges granted to them, and 'to whom much is given much shall be required.' What matters it that they are rich in this world's goods; what matters it that a stroke of a Rothschild's pen can let loose the warhorse, and plunge nations into a deluge of blood; the race is a down-trodden one, and the name Jew is a synonyme for cringing meanness, and the stigma of that curse will remain forever. It has stuck to them upwards of eighteen hundred years, and will hang over them, like a pall, as long as the race exists; and this is the everlasting fire to which they have been condemned. They were promised an eternal priesthood in Melchisedec, but that did not last more than two centuries; and shall we hesitate to call that everlasting which has existed more than eighteen?"

Such bibliolatry and bigotry deserve to be lashed with a whip of scorpions. Here is a "minister of Christ," preaching the "religion of love," and doing his utmost to perpetuate a false, hateful, cruel, and damnable prejudice against the Jews! To save the reputation of an infallible Bible, he utters the vilest wholesale slanders against a long persecuted race to which the world's debt is immense, thus adding to the shame of falsehood the shame of the blackest ingratitude. It is false that "the name Jew is a synonyme of cringing meanness;" it is false that "the stigma of that curse will remain forever." Here in America the beneficent genius of freedom and universal fellowship is wiping out the curse hurled against a whole nation by tyrannical and self-righteous Christendom; here, the spirit of republican institutions, so much nobler and more merciful than the spirit of Christianity, teaches that the Jews are our brothers, to be welcomed as brothers ought to be welcomed, and to be treated as those ought to be treated whose race has in all ages rendered such signal services to humanity. Thanks to free thought and free government, the "curse" fulminated against the Jews is coming to an end, church or no church, Bible or no Bible; henceforth they stand as free and equal citizens before the law, the peers of the best and more than the peers of the insolent clergy who defame them. The day will come when the name of Jew and the name of Christian will be alike sunk in the grander name of MAN; but till that day has dawned, let no more Old-World hatreds cross the ocean to taint the air of these free shores!

A NEGRO minister widower, who married rather sooner than some of the sisters thought proper and becoming, excused himself as follows: "My dear brethren and sisters, my grief was greater than I could bear. I turned every way for peace and comfort, but none came. I searched the Scriptures from Genesis to Revelations, and found plenty of promises to the widder, but nary one to the widderer. And so I took it that the Lord didn't waste sympathy on a man when it was in his power to comfort himself; and, having a first-rate chance to marry in the Lord, I did so again. Besides, brethren, I considered that poor Betsey was just as dead as she ever would be."

A COUNTRYMAN in Savannah observed a gang of negroes at work in the streets, each wearing a ball and chain. He asked one why that ball was chained to his leg. "To keep people from stealing it," said the darkey. "Heap of thieves about here."

Literary Notices.

SAXE HOLM'S STORIES.

It is good news—the announcement that this remarkable series of stories will be reprinted, in a volume, from Scribner's Monthly. It is not merely that the volume will be welcome, but it is an encouraging thing that the public should demand it. It shows that we are not wholly given over to the "Danbury Man," and to General Wallace's "Fair God." When a man sees the burst of applause with which this last-named novel has been received—not merely by the New York Ledger and the Ladies' Book, but by the Literary World and the Boston Daily Advertiser, it makes him tremble for the future of his country. It makes him ask if our literary stock-market is no securer than that in Wall Street. It even makes him grateful for the existence of the New York Nation, and that is saying a great deal. It makes him, at any rate, grateful that such a series of stories as those of Saxe Holm—so simple, so quiet, so passionate, so profound, so delicately touched—should actually find readers and be popular.

It is now some three years since the first of these stories, bearing a name then utterly unknown, appeared in Scribner. The name remains as mysterious now as then. Nobody doubts that it is a pseudonyme; and the appearance of the name of Norman Holm, attached to another story in Scribner, threw no light on it. If Norman Holm be a member of the same family, there must be a great variation in the family gifts. Be this as it may, the instinct of all readers has recognized Saxe Holm as a woman; and the wonder is that a woman of such rare power should remain unknown. It is hard to identify her with any of our well-known writers. Whatever qualities American women carry into literature, they are almost all wanting in the air of thorough training, the careful literary finish exhibited by Saxe Holm. Mrs. Stowe and Miss Alcott are singularly wanting in it; Miss Phelps' execution is uneven; Mrs. Spofford has power enough for anything except quiet simplicity; Mrs. Moulton does not analyze deeply enough. Rose Terry is far beyond all these in sustained literary execution, but her stories have always a more rustic air, and she never sounds such depths. "H. H." has the same careful literary execution in her prose, and some of Saxe Holm's poems are exquisite enough for the author of "Verses"—but "H. H." has never shown any tendency toward fiction, and, moreover, would hardly need a duplicate nom de plume. Nor is there anything that reminds us of Celia Thaxter's graceful beach-birds and light-houses. It would seem, therefore, that if Saxe Holm be a woman, she manifests a new power, differing in kind from that of any one of her sex yet known in our literature.

And when she is compared with American men who write short stories, to whom shall we liken her? Bret Harte has written a few stories that are immortal; but he has shown no "staying-power": he now only repeats himself, and whenever he attempts to depict the thoughts and feelings of cultivated or even civilized minds, he fails absolutely. Hale's stories have a certain cleverness and activity, but they are hasty, crude, and at last tiresome. Aldrich's few trifles are ingenious and graceful; but, after all, they offer us only piquant confectionery, not solid food. Not one of these has produced a study of character which can be compared for originality, strength, delicacy, and fidelity of tracing, to Saxe Holm's "Draxy Miller." Not one of them has sounded such depths of human emotion as in "Esther Wynne's Love-Letters." And these depths are sounded, be it observed, without sentimentalism, or spasms, or gush, or weakness; the same quiet, assured touch shows itself through all. The profound, subtle analysis of a strange experience in "Whose Wife was She?"—the noble, elevated wisdom of "How one Wife Kept her Husband;" the grace and ingenuity of "The One-legged Dancers,"—it is not too much to say that the whole conception and execution of these stories may rank their author with George Eliot. And though in the earlier pages the quality of humor seemed wanting to complete the likeness,—yet in "The Elder's Wife" this also is manifested; and there are in it admirable touches of New England village character and life.

To those who read stories only for incident, Saxe Holm may be less palatable than the last "Dime Novel," but to those who read for the study of character, her stories will be worth more than almost any American fiction; while their style affords another illustration of what Lady Pollock has lately proclaimed in the Contemporary Review, that there is more attention paid to careful literary execution by the best American writers than by the English. Holding this opinion of these remarkable stories, it may be well to express it, in advance of their republication; and this not in the interest of the unknown author, nor of the known publisher; but in the interest of the reading public and of good letters.

THE "SPIRITUAL" DELUSION: Its Methods, Teachings, and Effects. The Philosophy and Phenomena Critically Examined. By Dyer D. Lum, Author of The Early Social Life of Man. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1873.

This is a very thoughtful and well-written book of 252 pages, the object of which is "to give reasons for believing that spirits of the dead are not concerned in any of these various phenomena [of Spiritualism]." The dedication is striking: "To the memory of my brother and sister this attempt to rescue the names of our loved ones beyond the silent river, and the tender memories associated with them treasured in the secret recesses of our hearts, from profanation by strolling jugglers and their credulous dupes, these pages are affectionately dedicated." Part I. is devoted to the "philosophy," and Part II. to the "phenomena," of what the author calls "Spiritism." Under the first head he considers in successive chapters the subjects of "Modern Spiritualism Unscientific in its Methods," "Modern Spiritualism Unphilosophical in its Teachings," and "Modern Spiritualism Unnatural in its Effects." Under the second head he considers "Mental Exaltation," "Obsession," "Unconscious Action of the Brain," "What Phenomena Occur?" and "Physical Manifestations." Altogether, Mr. Lum has made a complete and wide survey of his subject, to which he has devoted much study and personal observation; and he manifests considerable acquaintance with modern scientific research in the difficult field of neurology. Although formerly a believer in "spirit-communion," continued investigation, evidently conducted with intelligence and conscientiousness, has made him arrive at the conclusions indicated above; and he fortifies them by reasoning which ought not to be overlooked by any candid "investigator." I recommend the book very strongly to all who are interested in the topic of which it treats, and who, whether believers or unbelievers, are candid enough to desire to learn what unbelievers have to say for themselves. Mr. Lum has frequently contributed to the pages of THE INDEX, and many of its readers will be anxious to know what so ingenious and fair-minded a man has to report concerning his own reflections and "investigations." ANOTHER DEFINITION OF RELIGION.

EDITOR INDEX:—

I have been deeply interested in studying the various definitions of religion in THE INDEX. Yours seems to me high enough, but not low enough. Does not this definition include a larger truth? Religion is man's desire to obey the law of his own nature. Is not this inherent vital desire the root or germ from which all religions have grown? Is it not the active principle of all his "efforts to perfect himself"? Is it not the "attraction of Mind finite to Mind infinite"? Is there any way for one to perfect oneself except through obedience to the laws of one's nature? Then does not this include all other definitions, while reaching still lower down? A religion that essays to be universal must include the germ as well as the stalk and fruit. It must take hold of a man with his first taste of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. His desire to obey comes of his experience of the evil of disobedience. This is the beginning of his religious experience. Some of this knowledge of evil he may gain from others. There are two sets of laws governing each person, the universal and the special. He may learn of the first from others; the second he must learn for himself. Wishing to make a platform big enough for all the good, John Wesley made the only condition of joining his societies "a desire to flee the wrath to come." Surely scientific religion should be as broad, and include all that have a desire to obey the laws of their own nature. Some would say religion is obedience to the laws of one's own nature. But this is not comprehensive enough. The desire must precede the act as the stimulus to the nerve of motion precedes the motion. Scientific religion must include the whole phenomena; and what phenomena are there that have not grown out of man's desire to obey these laws, and partake of the fruit of the tree of life?

Will you, Mr. Editor, be so kind as to give me your opinion of this definition?

Yours truly, RELIGION.

[The above modest little article is a real contribution to the discussion on which it touches. Our correspondent, instead of seeking to narrow our own definition of religion, seeks to broaden it still further; and his queries are full of suggestion. "Perfection" and "obedience to the laws of one's own nature" are substantially the same thing; and so far the two definitions are at one. But while we have made the effort to become perfect the distinctive mark of religion, our correspondent would go still farther back, and find it in the simple desire to become perfect. This attempt to discover a still more universal characteristic of religion than the one we have emphasized is in the right direction; and we trust it will not pass unheeded by those interested in the subject.]

Now this was the thought that determined us to emphasize effort rather than desire as the essential fact to be defined. To adopt language in harmony with the law of evolution, DESIRE IS THE PRE-NATAL LIFE OF RELIGION, WHILE EFFORT IS ITS ACTUAL BIRTH. It is perfectly true that desire must precede effort; but not all desire becomes effort. Many a noble desire perishes before birth into action; and then it seems to be the unfructified germ, the nipped bud, of religion, rather than religion itself. But no noble effort is made without antecedent desire, and therefore pre-supposes it. For this reason, we originally framed our brief definition so as to bring out the fact of effort, leaving the prior fact of desire to be naturally inferred; and on the whole we think that this is better than to adopt a definition which would fail to express the cardinal truth that religion is noble life rather than noble sentiment alone.—Ed.]

ORTHODOX EXPOSTULATION.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

My Brother Man,—Before you go any farther in the work that you are pursuing, read these words. I have written them in the "fear of God," and in accordance with that Book out of which you and I must be judged—the Bible:—

"I, the Lord, do keep it. I will water it every moment, lest any hurt it. I will keep it night and day." These words are found in the book of Isaiah, xxvii., 3, and no man has read history aright until he has read it in the light of this promise. "Behold," says the prophet, "I have created the waster to destroy." Why, then, how absolutely they are subject unto him! And so the declaration continues: "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper." How necessarily this conclusion follows: God creates the waster for his own work. Oh, are you, my brother, to be one of the tools of divine wrath? Stop one moment—look around, and see. The end for you may come sooner than you expect it. Do you choose a liberal hell? Your feet are certainly on the threshold of it. Do you think that God will permit you to work against his own designs? Shall the instrument which he has formed be permitted to turn its edge against his own Church, for which he died? No, it shall not, says the Book of God. No, it has not, says the book of history. And now, claiming this promise (only one of the many with which God's Bible abounds), I ask you, brother, can you point out the weapon through all the annals of ages which has been formed against his Church and prospered? Unnumbered times have weapons been formed against it,—been raised; but have they prospered? No! they have been turned aside, or the sinews of the arm that dealt the blow have been palsied. And now dare you, a man, try to measure arms with the Almighty? I tell you, in the fear of God, it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Oh, how with a breath he could grind you into dust, or annihilate your soul! Are you bold enough to brave him? You will come down at the bar before which you and I will stand; and, unless you turn from your wicked purpose, you will howl with damned souls through all eternity. Oh, brother, what a stupendous work you have dared to take into your hands! This Church of the living God, founded in the Councils of Eternity, kept by its power, ransomed by his blood,—oh, have you a part therein? You may have all else; but if you have not this, you are miserably poor. You read over the conquests of the great ones of earth,—and as you tell the story of Cyrus, and Alexander, and the world's mightiest heroes, a still small voice is always sounding in your ears:—

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

MRS. HUMPHREY.

FROSTBURG, Md.

AN ORTHODOX CHALLENGE.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Your paper circulates here, and for good or for ill is exerting an influence among our people. I believe for ill; doubtless, you think for good, for I do not impugn any one's motives. Let me ask a serious question, to which I hope you will give a candid answer. When you have destroyed all sense of religion, all ideas of the existence of a Supreme Being, what will be left to give stability to public virtue, or, indeed, to inspire virtue at all? The nation has just been shocked at the exposure of corruption in its officials occupying high positions. Can we afford, at such a time, to take away another prop from the temple of virtue? If Wilson—the two Wilsons,—Colfax, Ames, Garfield, Brooks, Carpenter, Harlan, and the whole ring of swindlers, had been members of the Church and honestly religious, do you suppose it would have been possible for these corruptions to have been committed? Do you suppose that, if Morton was a good Methodist, or Presbyterian, or a member of some other Orthodox Church, he would have the reputation all over the United States of being a lecher? If Oglesby had been religious, would he have violated the Constitution of his State, which he had sworn to support, in order to go to the United States Senate? Do you imagine that Pomeroy, or Caldwell, who went there by bribery, are religious men? I know nothing of the professions of these fellows. Some of them may pretend to be religious. So might Satan. But if you will take the trouble to inquire into their professions, you will find the majority of them either infidels, or (what is about the same) affecting the religion of some of the so-called liberal churches.

If, after you have examined into the facts, you will report them in your paper, you will furnish a practical argument for religion that will refute many of your fine-spun metaphysical speculations. Oh, my dear sir, if your paper could manfully wheel into line, and give its force and influence to the cause of truth, you might have reason to rejoice for the change.

I have heard a great deal said about your being a fair and candid man; but I am afraid you will not dare to put your theories to so practical a test as to publish this. W. H. S.

ITHACA, N. Y.

[It cannot be denied that W. H. S. (who is not our editorial contributor of the same initials) is one of the boldest men on the continent. He challenges investigation into the religious professions of the leaders of the Crédit Mobilier, as if all who took part in that eminent swindle were "infidels" or "liberal" churchmen. In reply we say: Henry Wilson is a member of the Orthodox Congregationalist denomination,—Harlan is a Methodist church-member,—Colfax and Patterson are members of Evangelical sects,—and we believe that others of the same "ring" are similarly connected. As to the rest we know nothing in this respect. Whether such facts will cause Free Religion or Christianity to wince, the reader may judge.—Ed.]

THE INDEX "FOUND WANTING."

SALINA, Kan., Oct. 15, 1873.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—It is possible you may fully realize the conclusion now forming in the minds of those who have watched with interest the outspoken course heretofore pursued by THE INDEX. It promised fair at the outset to lead the van on every question of social and religious rationalism, and at once appealed to the support and sympathy of those who hoped to find in it the bold and fearless advocate now demanded in the present return of thought to first principles of common sense. THE INDEX is found wanting.

Your silence on the infamous treatment of a woman whom you now regard as having been the "dupe of her own imagination" has clearly defined your position. No radical need mistake it. There is a conservatism about your treatment of Mrs. Woodhull that merits for THE INDEX no more consideration than is likely to be bestowed on the Independent, or the Liberal Christian. "The instincts of a generous nature" that conflict with the disrobing of recognized hypocrisy can never be productive of much good. Austin Kent falls of the mark when he is unwilling to justify or condemn Mr. Beecher. It is not necessary with the facts in the case for logical minds to conclude that the charges are still unproved. Either personal pique or astounding ignorance must be offered as an excuse by those who can "afford to wait." Intolerance and bigotry will scarcely tremble on such a platform. However trivial and devoid of attractions you may regard the Beecher-Tilton-Comstock conspiracy, it is nevertheless a fact to be deplored that THE INDEX, from which we had reason to hope much, is now in danger of consummating so little. Most respectfully,

D. G. CHITTENDEN.

[Mr. Chittenden is entirely welcome to his opinion of THE INDEX, and to a full expression of it in THE INDEX itself. He is also welcome to explain our course by "personal pique" or "astounding ignorance," by "conservatism," or cowardice, or malice, or whatever he considers just. But that any large number of radicals should be so narrow as to make their own opinion on a mere question of facts the criterion of radical principles, or to condemn everybody as "conservative" who governs his course by his own sense of right rather than theirs, is what we shall not believe except on stronger evidence than any hitherto offered. So long as THE INDEX is conducted with honesty, sincerity, and fairness, it will be supported by the really liberal public; and when these things are disregarded, we do not care how soon it dies.—Ed.]

CAN THE HOPES OF THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE BE REALIZED?

TO THE INDEX:—

The New York Tribune is laying before its thousands of readers an account of the proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance now holding its sessions and discussions in New York city. Here are assembled, from nearly all parts of the Christian world, the learned, the profound and dignified representatives of all the Christian sects, for the purpose of taking steps towards arresting the decline and preventing the fall of Christianity—whatever they all mean by that word.

In our day, it is difficult to know with any certainty what is meant by the word "Christianity," the "Christian Religion," and such expressions; for, the Protestant will not accept the definition of the Catholic, nor will that of the Catholic or Protestant be accepted by the Greek or Russian. Then the Protestant Episcopal Church will not accept the definition furnished by any one of the "dissenting" churches or "sects"; and these "sects," again, all disagree on this point one with the other. What then is Christianity? What is the Christian Religion?

I think I have discovered a point on which all the churches and sects will at once cordially agree. It is this: the Christian Religion is that which was held and taught by Jesus Christ and the apostles. Now while I am trying to construct a homely common-sense argument here, it is not in the least necessary that the reader and I should know what they taught; they taught something; they taught a religion; and no minister of the Christianity of to-day can expect a better effect on the world from the working of his or his neighbor's Christianity than has been produced by that Christianity which, whatever it really was, was preached by Christ and his apostles.

While, then, the Evangelical Alliance is saying such fine things of its not yet defined religion, and of the wondrous great things it is going to do in the future, is it not proper to ask them if they expect it to do better than the pure and powerful Christianity that came immediately from the hands of Christ and the apostles?

And if that Christianity, at the fountain head, failed,—if it disappointed the lofty hopes of priests and prophets,—where is the ground for the sublime expectations of the Alliance respecting the Christianity of to-day, to a definition of which its professors cannot agree, and the elementary, self-denying precepts of which they and their lordly step-brothers of the Catholic Church have practically departed from?

Now how has the Christianity of the apostolic age fared? According to the expressed mind of the Catholic Church, it has fared splendidly. But what say the grave men of the Alliance? That it very soon became corrupt, and went on corrupting, spreading falsehoods and abominations by forgery and fraud, until it became a colossal tyrant over the whole Christian world. Such was the state of affairs that, with respect to it, the early Church of England (see its Homilies and Articles of Faith) approved the following description of it:—

"All sects and degrees of men, women, and children of whole Christendom were at once drowned in abominable idolatry, detested of God and damnable to man, and that for the space of eight hundred years and more." (Previous to the Reformation, of course.)

The picture of the middle ages which the most impartial history presents is enough to make one shudder, and it is such men as now compose this Evangelical Alliance that have made us acquainted with that history. How, then, can this Alliance hope for the success of its evangelical efforts where the religion of the apostles has, according to them, so signally failed?

I quote from one of the speeches of the Alliance, made by the Rev. H. H. Jessup, D.D., of Beirut, Syria:—

"It is one of the marvels of Christian history that, after the lapse of nearly two thousand years, the birth-place of Christianity is missionary ground. The encampments of the Prince of Darkness, like the black tents of the Bedouins, cover the lands where prophets and apostles preached, and where He appeared who is himself the Truth and the Life."

Here is a full confession of complete and signal failure on the part of what the speaker believes to have been genuine, unadulterated Christianity. How singular that in a fair fight between the "Prince of Darkness" and God himself, the latter should be worsted and routed, and the former come forth from the strife with the laurel of victory on his brow! But the military metaphors are all bosh. The great Eastern Christian farm became worthless by bad management, and the shiftless owners left and "went West," where they reduced another fine farm to absolute sterility, and are now puzzled to know what to do!

Genuine, united, apostolic Christianity, then, has failed. Can the apocryphal and divided Christianity of the Evangelical Alliance hope for better results in our day, when Reason is unfettered, when the right of all to progressive education is practically recognized, and when science declares of this religion of the far past that it is not true?

EXTRACTS FROM PLOTINUS.

NEVADA, Missouri, Oct. 14, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

In Plotinus' work Against the Gnostics I find several passages which may interest the readers of THE INDEX. The passages evidently refer not only to the founder of Christianity, but also to the Christians of the third century. I may add that everything that Plotinus says is applicable to the Christians of the nineteenth century:—

"Farther still, they do not honor this sensible fabrication of things, nor this visible earth, but they say that there is a new earth produced for them, into which they are to ascend from hence."

"But stupid men are persuaded when they suddenly hear such sounds as these: 'You are better, not only than all other men, but also than the gods.' For there is much arrogance among men of the present time. And he who prior to this was humble, and modest, and a man of no consequence, becomes exalted beyond measure when he is told, 'You are the son of God; but other men whom you formerly admired, are not the sons of God; as neither are these beings which men honor conformably to the rites of their ancestors.' It may be shown, however, without any labor, that you are more excellent than the heavens themselves." Others, also, vociferate the same things."

The Neo-Platonists are generally stigmatized as rationalists by ecclesiastics. This is the kind of mental pabulum that the thinker needs.

Yours respectfully,

THOMAS M. JOHNSON.

FARMER DRENNIDGE (meeting his rector at the Royal Academy Exhibition.)—"Have you noticed this beautiful picture," sir, No. 988, by Mr. Wee Prinsep, o' the evil spirits that entered the herd o' swine, and they rushed violently down the precipice, and perished in the sea? Tha's the picture I'd like to hev, sir. But there's one p'int about that 'straordinary ewent, sir, as has allus weighed on my mind, and I've often thought o' astin' o' you—"Rector—"Oh, I shall be most happy, Mr. Drennidg, at any time to explain—"Farmer Drennidg—"Well, it's this 'ere, sir." (In a serious whisper.) "Whew paid for them drowned pigs, sir?"—Punch.

A MARRIAGE between a Christian gentleman and a Jewish lady, not long since, exercised the minds of some of their friends. "Pooh! pooh!" said a gentleman, "why in the world make such a fuss about it. After all, they will only be bound together like the Old and New Testament!"

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

SPECIAL NOTICE TO OLD SUBSCRIBERS OF THE TRIBUNE:—Any former subscriber to THE TRIBUNE, whose name has not been on our books since February, 1873, may obtain THE WEEKLY TRIBUNE from this or any subsequent date, to January 1, 1875, by sending $2—the price of subscription for one year—to this office.

TO CLERGYMEN.—THE DAILY TRIBUNE will be sent one year for $9; the SEMI-WEEKLY for $2.50, and the WEEKLY for $1.50. Address THE TRIBUNE, New York.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Tribune Extra.

[Quadruple Sheet.]

The complete and unexampled reports in THE DAILY TRIBUNE of the papers, discussions and proceedings of the World's Evangelical Alliance at its recent meeting in New York, averaging twenty columns per day, for nearly two weeks, will soon appear in a Tribune Extra. This Extra, which will be one of the largest papers ever issued in this country, will contain four full sheets of THE TRIBUNE size, and will form the only connected and authentic history of the entire session of the Alliance, at a price within reach of all. Many of the papers have been revised by their authors since they were presented, and others which were read in part only or not at all, are given by THE TRIBUNE in full. The Tribune Extra is thus of historic interest and permanent value,—indispensable to every intelligent student of current history and the events of the religious world. Price by mail 25 cents; ten copies to any clergyman's address for $2.

LEWIS G. JAMES, Proprietor.A. K. Butts & Co.'s New Publications.The Essence of Religion.
GOD THE IMAGE OF MAN.

Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and
Only Source of Religion.

Translated from the German of LUDWIG FRUEN-
BACH, by Professor A. Loos.
12mo. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 60 cents.

To see man trembling and exulting at the sight
of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to the soul.
Feuerbach's Atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His Materialism was designed to prevent man's exalting in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul.—He did, and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve the integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that was spilled over the edge of the grave, and lost on the other side. This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected,
etism's Horticultural Hall Lecture, Jan. 1873.*

Materialism:

ITS ANCIENT HISTORY, ITS RECENT DE-
CENCE.

Translated from the author's manuscript by Professor A. Loos. 35 cts.

The Childhood of the World;

A SIMPLE ACCOUNT OF MAN IN EARLY TIMES.

By EDWARD CLODD, F.R.S.

12mo. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

Extract from a letter from Professor Max Müller to the author:—"I read your book with great pleasure. I have no doubt it will do good, and hope you will continue your work. Nothing spells our temper so much as having to unlearn in youth, manhood, and even old age, so many things which we were taught as children. A book like yours will prepare a far better soil in the child's mind, and I was delighted to have it read to my children."

E. B. Tylor, F.R.S., in "Nature" says:—"This genial little volume is a child's book as to shortness, clearness, and simplicity of style, though the author reasonably hopes that older people will use it as a source of information not popularly accessible elsewhere, as the life of Primitive Man and its relation to our own. This book, if the time has come for the public to take to it, will have a certain effect in the world. It is not a mere compilation from the authors mentioned in the preface, but takes its own grounds, and stands by and for itself. Mr. Clodd has thought out his philosophy of life, and used his best skill to bring it into the range of a child's view."

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Popular fallacies concerning this question have had no more honest and fearless exposition than is given us in this handsome pamphlet. Mr. Underwood has treated this important theme with dignity, candor, and grace, yet with that vigor which has made him so popular on the platform among the Liberals of the West. Nor does he lack in erudition. He is profuse in quotations from standard histories, largely Christian, and shows conclusively but clearly from their own testimony what a drag upon civilization that stupendous fanaticism has been.

In paper covers; single copies, 25 cts. Address the publisher,

The town of GRAND RAPIDS, MICH. is the most thriving town in the West for its size and age. It stands at the head of steam navigation on the Grand river, and in the midst of a fertile country.

Its manufacturing facilities are not to be surpassed by any town in the country, East or West, as the rapids in the Grand river here give it practically an unlimited water power.

The facilities for shipping manufactured goods to all parts of the United States and Canada are unrivalled, except by our most metropolitan cities, as no less than seven railroads centre here, and more are in process of construction. A glance at a map of isothermal lines shows that Grand Rapids enjoys a much milder climate than many places farther south. The great fruit region of Western Michigan lies at her doors. Quite within the city limits is a gypsum mine extensive enough to supply the world for centuries. But the town has found, and for a dozen years to come will find, its main source of prosperity in the lumber trade and kinder manufactures.

It is the depot and outlet of the immense lumber region of North Western Michigan.
The variety, extent and quality of this lumber are what have made Grand Rapids the most notable place in the country for the manufacture of Household Furniture. The great house of NELSON, MATTER & CO.
ships the most finished and elegant furniture to all parts of America. They have, the past season, made large shipments to the far South and to California. They have recently built one of the largest factories in the country, fitted with the latest improved machinery, and situated near an immense hard-wood timbered forest. Thus they are enabled to compete with any nation.

GRAND RAPIDS is beautifully situated on rolling land, in a very healthy region, and is supplied with nearly all the conveniences of the most metropolitan city, such as gas, street railways, and its water works are now in process of erection. The public schools are excellent, and naturally there is a large and influential element of Freethinkers; and one which is increasing rapidly. An agent of THE INDEX here last year obtained over twenty subscribers in a short time. But time and space would fail us to enumerate the attractions of this thriving city. Any one desiring further information may address HENRY MILLER, REAL ESTATE AND LOAN AGENT,
Grand Rapids, Mich., or Asa K. Butts, 36 Dey Street, New York.

A CARD.—We desire to return our thanks to our patrons for the indulgent patience they have shown with our youth and inexperience in the book publishing business. To this inexperience is doubtless owing the fact that our printers failed by one month's time in fulfilling their contract with us. The necessary absence of Mr.
Butts for four weeks also retarded our work.

All orders for the works of Underwood, Büchner and Frothingham were filled a week since, together with all orders of a miscellaneous character. "The Essence of Religion," "The Childhood of the World," our Catalogue, and a most excellent criticism, by Frederic Harrison, entitled "The Religion of Humanity," will be back from the binders before this paper leaves the press. We have in press a paper of great interest on "The Religion of Witchcraft to Religion." We have also in press Dr. L. Büchner's principal work, "Force and Matter," "Man," which we intend to issue at a price greatly reduced from the English edition, and within the reach of every Liberal. When they are quite ready we will let the public know.

We also return thanks for some small donations of Liberal tracts, etc., to be gratuitously distributed among our patrons, as occasion may offer.
We intend to keep any book or Liberal, as such, may require, constantly on hand.

Respectfully,

"It is impossible to read this fascinating pages without feeling awakened within us a desire to emulate the author in his efforts to obtain a knowledge of life beneath the waters, of which most of us know nothing."—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

"It is splendidly illustrated and popularly written, with much humor, and the treatment, like the subject, is anything but dry; it is a volume altogether worthy the interest and importance of its subject."—Popular Science Monthly.

"The volume, which forms one of the most important contributions of the season to the science of physical geography, is brought out in a style of rare typographical elegance, and is copiously illustrated with admirable drawings from Nature. It will fill a choice place in the library, both for the interest of its contents and the beauty of its execution."—N. Y. Tribune.

"Nothing can be more complete than the account of the scientific results of these voyages, which are fully illustrated by wood-cuts of the strange forms of life brought from the dark depths of the ocean, by charts of soundings and elaborate tables of the deep sea temperature. The book is another example of that mingling of literary interest with scientific completeness and value, which is the only true form of what is called the popularization of science."—Daily News (London).

"This book is a luxurious introduction to the study of the physical sciences. M. Guillemin has found an excellent translator in Mrs. Norman Lockyer, while the editorship of Mr. Norman Lockyer, with his notes and additions, are guarantees not only of scientific accuracy but of the completeness and lateness of the information."—Daily News (London).

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."—Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."—Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions—'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?' are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."—Scotman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to those which it supports."—Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."—Medical Times and Gazette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and out-spoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Buechner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed minutely anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a pithy and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign savants in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."—Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Buechner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with praiseworthy neatness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."—Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against, and delivering judgment after independent investigation."—Public Opinion.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC.

BROCHURE OF AMERICAN ART.

With Illustrations by the best American Artists, Designed and Engraved expressly for this work.

Will be ready Oct. 15th.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC has been gotten up regardless of expense, with the purpose of making it, beyond competition, the most beautiful publication of the kind ever attempted in this country. Unlike other almanacs, it is not filled with second-hand cuts, but is purely original. Every design has been made and engraved by the best artists expressly for its illustration. THE ALDINE ALMANAC is truly national in conception, and will be at once accepted as the standard for taste and accuracy in every section of the United States.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE CALENDARS.

Mr. John S. Davis, a young and rising artist, who is beginning to be recognized as the coming draughtsman of America, has contributed liberally to the embellishments of this ALMANAC. His set of twelve calendar borders is admirable, and entirely unique in their way.

THE SCHUYLEILL

is represented by a splendid full-page cut, from a drawing of Thomas Moran, the strongest landscape artist in America.

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT.

A TROPICAL SCENE.

One of the most exquisite pictures which it is possible to conceive is contributed by Mary Nemo, to illustrate lines from Joaquin Miller.

RIP VAN WINKLE.

A disquisition on this popular American legend is illustrated by four designs by Mr. Davis.

EVENING ON THE DELAWARE.

is a most perfect picture, by Thomas Moran. It shows that American pastoral scenery has ample charms for poetical illustration, and needs only to be properly treated to have this fact fully recognized.

THE MELANCHOLY DAYS.

This picture is strong and full of poetic feeling, and is a very fine illustration of Bryant's well-known lines.

OLDEN TIME SOUTHERN LIFE.

Mr. Sheppard, a Virginia artist, gives us a glimpse of the patriarchal phase of American slavery. He has chosen a Christmas scene, when the "servants" present themselves for the usual presents, and good wishes and kindly feeling rule in every breast.

A 'COON HUNT

is a second contribution of Mr. Sheppard's, and one of the most striking in the work.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCHOOLMASTER.

THE ILLUMINATED COVER.

The cover of THE ALDINE ALMANAC is the richest specimen of the medieval style of illumination ever produced in America.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC will be sent to any address, in roller, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, 60 cents.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformable to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———. Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

ANNA DICKINSON believes that ladies should have the right to ride horseback in the most convenient way.

"TWO HUNDRED and odd millions" is the number claimed of "faithful subjects throughout the world" to Pius IX.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE was very liberal, but it wasn't liberal enough to receive the delegation sent to it by the Universalists.

WE FIND IT reliably recorded that the aggregate of capital invested in railroads, in this country, will foot up nearly four thousand millions of dollars.

WE ARE GLAD that Howard University, in Washington, has at least one thorough radical on its educational staff, in the person of Prof. F. W. Clarke, late of this city.

W. C. GANNETT read an essay, full of interest and beauty, before the Second Radical Club, Monday evening, Oct. 27. The next meeting of the Club will be on the evening of Nov. 10.

MRS. E. D. CHENEY, one of the editorial contributors to THE INDEX, is travelling in the West. She occupied a pulpit in Chicago, one Sunday, and, as might be supposed, preached most acceptably.

DR. STRAUSS, author of the Life of Jesus, says that he has a disease "which the physicians have declared incurable," and that he is "without the hope" of ever being able to resume his literary labors.

THE PRESIDENT every now and then pardons a Ku-Klux criminal. Why not? "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those that trespass against us." But this applies to a red man as much as to a white.

"WE BELIEVE that through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved,"—this, as stated in the closing address of Rev. Dr. Woolsey, President of the Evangelical Alliance, is the one plank upon which all Christians can unite.

NEWS FROM Washington hints that we, the people, are next year to have the privilege of paying a larger tax for our government than we now pay. Well, we shouldn't object to paying more, if what we got were better worth our money.

PRESIDENT GRANT has decreed that the 27th day of November shall be, this year, the nation's day for "thanksgiving and prayer." His excellency has occasion himself to be thankful for that extra twenty-five thousand dollars a year.

GEN. SICKLES, our minister to Spain, has had a sword presented to him by the Spanish government. Did the general, when he received that Toledo blade, remember that the Scripture saith, "They who take the sword shall perish by the sword"? If all the Scripture must be fulfilled, let him look out for himself!

IN HIS RECENT Concord address, Mr. Emerson says: "If you sprain your foot, you will presently come to think that Nature has sprained here, everything begins to look so slow and inaccessible; and when you sprain your mind by gloomy reflections on your evils and vexations, you come to have a bad opinion of life."

THOMAS HOLLIS, who was an Englishman, but a notable benefactor to Harvard College, has no monument over his grave. "When he died," says M. D. Conway, "he required, in his will, that his body should be quietly buried ten feet below the surface in one of his green fields, and the spot ploughed over and sowed with grain."

MR. JOHN FISKE says: "What matters it whether we are pleased with the notion of a monkey ancestry or not? The end of scientific research is the discovery of truth, and not the satisfaction of our whims or fancies. A scientific inquirer has no business to have preferences." That hits the nail on the head, and is as applicable to religious inquirers and thinkers as to scientific.

THE POPE and Emperor William have recently had an interesting correspondence about their mutual little difficulty. The pope says he thinks the emperor doesn't mean to do wrong, and the emperor says he thinks the pope will do right now that he is "told of the truth." In the meantime, the German State and the Romish Church still stand in hostile attitude towards each other.

"MIRACLES" persist in recurring. A Methodist woman, in New Hampshire, who had been sick for a long time, lately beheld "her Savior" enter her room, who "breathed upon her and vanished." She immediately got well. Is she absolutely sure that the "appearance" which she saw was "her Savior," and why doesn't this same "Savior" go about curing every sick person? It is hardly fair in him to be so partial.

MISS FRANCES POWER CORRE recently preached in the pulpit of one of the Unitarian missions in London—her first appearance in the clerical capacity. Miss Cobbe was an intimate friend and warm admirer of Theodore Parker; her theological position is extra-Christian, being that of simple theism. Mr. Conway says she was "flattered with interest," but he thinks that she does better as a writer than she will do as a preacher.

THE BROOKLYN Eagle says that "In 1815, when the Unitarian denomination took its name, the liberal churches in Boston numbered one more than the Evangelical; but, in 1873, the latter are nearly three times as many as the former." There was a time when this statement would have caused us some chagrin; but now we recognize in it the fitness of things. Unitarianism is no longer consistent with itself, no longer faithful to its first principles; therefore it is not increasing but diminishing.

THE Popular Science Monthly says that, "even as appliances to intellectual culture, books are greatly over-estimated." What books to read and what not it requires rare judgment to know. One ought not to read voraciously any more than to eat so; the mind can become dyspeptic as well as the body. A good general rule in reading is to select those books produced only by the master minds,—such as stand the test of time, and, though old, are ever new. But with all the aid of the very best books, no one can become wise who does not studiously learn by observation of life and Nature.

REV. ANTONINETTE BROWN BLACKWELL read a paper on "Woman's Office Outside of the House" before the recent Women's Congress in New York, which would seem to have been both sensible and able. She pleaded for less drudgery for women, and more culture,—especially for that large class of housekeeping women. She said: "There must be a reconstruction in woman's household duties. Every housewife should find no less than three hours each day that she can call her own. Let the husband help his wife; many hands make light work, and the heart will be lightened proportionally." Husbands will please take notice, and govern themselves accordingly.

THE ORTHODOXY of Rev. Mr. Murray's horseology seems to be well nigh as much questioned as that of his theology. He is quoted as having said, in his lately published book on The Perfect Horse, that a horse with a flat forehead will be a surly, ugly beast; but a writer in the Boston Globe says that "that is exactly opposite to my belief and experience." All the baulky vicious horses which he has ever seen, he says, "had full round foreheads, and an experienced and sagacious horseman at my elbow exactly agrees with me." We suppose that the perfect horse has no more been found than the perfect man. Whether, when he comes, he will have a flat head or a round one, remains to be seen; but the perfect man will probably have his head level.

The Ecclesiastical Foes of Rational Faith.

READ AT THE CONVENTION OF THE
FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION

In New York, Oct. 15, 1873.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

Religion, in its historical career, has had many and bitter foes. It has had to meet the spirit of denial and scepticism. It has been tormented by the hosts of infidelity. It has contended against the cold criticisms of philosophy. It has been compelled to make war upon the material and animal propensities of mankind,—or, in the old Evangelical phrase, "fight the world, the flesh, and the devil." It has had to encounter every form of malevolence, wrong, wickedness, sin, and misery with which the human race has been burdened. And yet, notwithstanding this picture of conflict with its natural enemies beyond its own lines, religion has had no enemies more hostile, more bitter, more persistent in their antagonism, than the foes which it has found in its own citadel—the Church. Its hardest foes, after all, have been "they of its own household;" as witness the bloody persecutions which mark but too clearly the trail of advancing truth in religious history,—the murder of Luther by Philip, of Spain, the massacre of Huguenots in Paris, the reciprocal slaughter of contending factions in earlier Christian history as one or the other had the temporal power, the imprisonment and hanging of religious dissenters in later times by those who had once been dissenters themselves, the long and honored roll of martyrs to their faith put to death by the bigoted devotees of a different faith; or outside of Christendom, the fierce contests for power between the crescent and the cross, the cruel expulsion of Buddhism by the earlier religion of India, the wars—with carnal weapons and with every form of cruelty, carnage, and misery—of faith against faith, which have everywhere blotted the pages of history. These are witnesses that show unimpeachably that religion has had no severer foes than the enemies in its own household. The Church itself, though the self-instituted guardian of religion, has always been more or less in conflict with the religious spirit which it was meant to protect and defend.

Surprising, however, as the fact may seem that religion should have thus found some of its greatest enemies within its own domain, yet we have not to look far for the cause. Religious institutions, which in their aggregate of organization and power we call the Church, are necessarily the result of religious beliefs and feelings that had their origin in a past epoch. They are the deposit of an inspiration, or sentiment, that has been, and are necessarily shaped by the mental and moral intelligence within which that inspiration had its limiting conditions. They were moulded by the exigencies, faith, thought, emotions of an era necessarily gone by; otherwise there would have been no opportunity for them to have grown and hardened into the consistency of institutions. Hence, naturally, religious institutions, or the Church, will always strive to conserve the beliefs and feelings of this past era out of which they came. On traditions they stand, and to traditions they will cling.

But religion, on the other hand, has its source, not in traditions, but in the present vitality of the human soul itself. Religion must necessarily have a present life, a present power. It springs from a source that is always teeming with the terms of fresh productions. Whatever affiliations it may have with the past, it must have affiliations also with the new knowledge and the new forms of human activity that mark the present era. Instead of permitting itself to be shaped wholly by the limiting exigencies of a past epoch, it will itself demand a shaping influence over the institutions that are to be. So far from submitting to the dominion of past beliefs and faiths, it claims to be their creator. And since it is the vitalizing spirit of all religious history, before it institutions, churches, forms of faith, creeds, sacraments, worship, are all fluid, to be moulded, under the progressive conditions of new thought and intelligence, to the spiritual exigencies of every new era.

This civil conflict, therefore, of religion with foes in its domain is always the conflict between the opening and widening religious faith which at any present time exists—opening and widening under the improved conditions of human intelligence—and the religious faith that took shape and form under the narrower conditions of a past intelligence. In a word, it is a conflict between the Church that has been and the Church that is to be. It is not, as it is sometimes expressed, a conflict between faith and reason, or between religion and science, but it is the more enlightened reason of any present era battling against the less developed reason of the past; it is religion in the light of science against the religion when there was little or no science; it is to-day's thought against yesterday's thought; or, since there is no faith which is not in some way connected with and dependent upon thought, it is the larger faith of one generation contending against the narrower faith of a preceding generation.

But in such a conflict it would seem as if the strength would all be on the side of the new thought, the new reason, the new faith; and, if this be the nature of it, how, it may be asked, can there be such vigor and persistency in the struggle? Would not the less enlightened reason of yesterday have to yield at once to the more enlightened reason of to-day? Can last century's thought stand up in battle against this century's? Or a narrower faith hold the field against a broader? Looking at the strength of the contestants alone, we should have to answer, "Impossible;

there can be no contest." And, ultimately, it is true that the greater strength always lies with the new thought, the larger reason, the larger faith; and in the end the victory must be there. But then it is to be remembered that the old thought and faith always have the advantage of possession. They hold the field which is to be won. They have the seat of government, they fill all the offices, they are the accepted authority in the spiritual realm. They have the prestige of antiquity and of being the regular rulers. All the mechanism of spiritual government, the organization, forces, treasury, material of war, are theirs. And from all this they derive an immense advantage, and enter the contest with resources that are ample for maintaining a long and vigorous struggle, and even for winning temporary victories. The new thought and new faith, on the other hand, are always in the attitude of reformers and revolutionists. They have no resources except of their own extemporaneous provision; and their strength lies solely in their own genuineness, and in the moral earnestness which animates the hearts of their devotees,—in these, and in the law, grounded in the natural order of human development, that genuine revolutions, however resisted and retarded, never go backward. Hence, as we have seen, this contest has been persistent, bitter, and often bloody.

Less bitter, and certainly much less bloody in our age, yet the contest still goes on. The form of it may have changed, yet it is an "irrepressible conflict,"—since it is a conflict between some narrow thought of yesterday, which is organized, and to-day's larger thought, which is free. The Church still harbors and supports some of the direst foes which religion has to meet.

For what is religion in its essence? Is it not the earnest devotion, in purpose, thought, deed, of each individual soul to the highest and best that is revealed to that soul? To the highest and best, stretching off to unseen heights, and connecting itself somewhere to a purpose and plan that are of infinite comprehension, and aim at universal good? And though such devotion as this finds enemies enough in the world,—finds them, as we might naturally expect, in the temptations of appetite, and in all the allurements of selfish ambition, avarice, and low, material living which are continually dragging human beings down from the goal of their purest aspirations and best endeavors,—yet it finds abundant enemies also, where at first view we should not expect to find them, in the limits of the Church itself. It finds them in that repression of thought which the ecclesiastical authorities are summoned to exercise, unless the thought shall agree with established dogmas. It finds them in the ecclesiastical denial of reason as a usurper against the alleged authority of what is termed revelation,—as if reason were not a manifestation of the creative spirit as much as any revelation could be, or were not the only possible agency through which infinite thought could be revealed to the finite. It finds them in the upholding of certain doctrines and rites as of supreme importance, and acceptance of them as a saving act for the soul, though reason may pronounce them irrational, and science condemn them as the surviving superstitions of a past epoch. It finds them in the fruitless contests of sect with sect over dogmas and ceremonies that seem alike unreasonable and of small significance, while the interests of human welfare are neglected, and mankind are suffering untold calamities from social wrong and degradation. It finds them, in a word, in the persistent opposition of organized religion to any change,—in the consequent opposition of the Church, in the main, to free thought, to social reform, to any efforts for the elevation and progress of man, unless those efforts shall in some way hinge on her own specific dogmas of salvation. Religion is devotion to the seeking and practicing of the highest truth,—truth in science, truth in morals, truth in society, truths of character; and truth in its revelation must necessarily be progressive to the finite mind. Yet religion finds the Church, the instituted guardian of its interests, so intent on conserving past discovery in the realm of moral and spiritual truth, that it shuts its doors against the truth that is coming to earnest minds and hearts to-day.

And these ecclesiastical foes to rational, progressive and practical religion may be readily and conveniently classified. First, there is the spirit of dogmatism; next, as growing directly out of dogmatism, the spirit of sectarianism; and third, superstition. A few words on the still prevailing power of each.

1. The spirit of dogmatism,—what is it? How shall we define it? It is the spirit that makes belief of more importance than character. More than this, it is the spirit that regards belief in certain ecclesiastically authorized dogmas—or what is called sound belief—as having a saving efficacy to the soul of the believer, the absence of such belief as a peril to the soul to be by all means shunned. When very strong, this spirit not only limits religious fellowship, but even social fellowship, and fellowship for humanitarian and philanthropic objects, by the barriers of a doctrinal confession. It is the spirit that says, Believe this like me, and you are saved; disbelieve it, and you are damned. It is the spirit that says, What my church believes is orthodox, true, genuine; what yours believes is false and leads to perdition: what my church teaches is a direct revelation from God, for through it runs the line of communication with him; what yours teaches is the product of carnal reason and the instigation of Satanic power.

Now this spirit, it must be admitted, has become very much mollified in these latter days. It does not exhibit itself in such fierceness and cruelty of antagonism as once it did. Yet it is the same spirit from which have sprung all the bitter persecutions that have dishonored the Church,—the spirit which once said, "This man does not believe as I do, and I must therefore make him believe by force, so as either to save his soul; or, if that be impossible, to save other souls by the warning of his suffering and perdition." It may have dropped some of its old methods, but it still exists, and finds many ways for exercising its power. Practically, it is the Pharisaical "I-am-better-than-thou" spirit which attaches itself to certain theological systems. Essentially, it is a form of spiritual conceit, arrogantly claiming an access to Divine knowledge which it assumes is denied to people holding different beliefs. Philosophically stated, it is an attempt to urge the acceptance of a proposition, not by showing the reasons on which it may be based, but by the sheer force of authority,—either the authority of one's own individual assertion, or the authority of ecclesiastical decrees and power. In enforcing its power, it has given up the thumb-screw, the rack, the dungeon and stake; but it still haunts all the ways and by-ways of the Church, appealing to motives which, in the mass of men, are hardly less potent than was the fear of these tortures. It appeals to people's fears concerning the future life, to the prudent feeling that would be on the safe side, rather than to the manly sentiment of being on the side of truth whatever happens. It operates upon the natural sentiment of remorse for wrong-doing, and lashes it into a morbid activity. It dexterously weaves in its demands among the most sacred associations and tender memories of pious souls, and threatens them with the loss of all, if its demands are not complied with. It threatens, moreover, loss of reputation, of position and influence, of ecclesiastical honor and advancement,—aye, even the loss of business and the means of daily bread, if its requisitions are not conceded. Formerly, the spirit of dogmatism did its fiercest work in the dungeon and the sword. Now, when bittens, it accomplishes its objects by the milder method which we may call ecclesiastical black-mailing.

But let me bring some facts to show that the spirit of dogmatism still exists, and is active. A young man in the West has just been practically ostracized from the Orthodox ministry and accepted a position as preacher to a Unitarian society, because, as he says, "The Unitarian church is the only one I know of in which the fundamental idea and principle of Protestantism is not practically denied. In other words, it is the only church in which the right of private judgment and freedom of thought and speech is permitted." His ability, his moral character, his religious zeal and earnestness, have not been questioned. But he was forced to the step, evidently because he could not retain Orthodox fellowship except by suppressing his honest convictions. But will he find that perfect freedom, as he now thinks, among Unitarians? I trust so, and, locally, perhaps, he will. But it is only a year ago that a young minister, of fine character and aspirations, a good preacher and a faithful worker among his people, was deprived of a Unitarian pulpit, for only going a little farther in the utterance of liberal opinions than has now gone his Orthodox brother in the West; and this, too, was the pulpit that was founded by Priestley in Pennsylvania, where that famous philosopher and theologian, escaping from the religious persecutions of his native land, hoped to establish a church that should be an asylum of religious liberty. Nor is this an exceptional instance among Unitarians! A gentleman, now on this platform, could tell you of a contest which he had with Unitarian dogmatists a few years ago in New Hampshire. And another, who it was hoped would be here as one of our speakers, might tell a story of Universalist dogmatism, as it exhibited itself some half dozen years ago in Boston, in its treatment of him for joining the Free Religious movement. This spirit of dogmatism, therefore, is not the exclusive possession of any one sect. We find exhibitions of it in the so-called liberal sects, though we find it, of course, oftener and stronger in the sects that are older, and possess more of ecclesiastical authority, and professedly lay more stress upon doctrinal distinctions. A curious and rather ludicrous illustration of it has lately been furnished by the chaplain of the State's Prison at Charlestown, who is so jealous for the orthodoxy of the convicts who make his parish that he takes away from them Unitarian books and tracts, which a philanthropic lady had left with them. He finally, however, yielded, so far as to allow James Freeman Clarke's Truths and Errors of Orthodoxy—a book which he said was "enough to unsettle any mind"—to be read by one of the worst of the convicts, a prisoner for life, because it was not of much consequence what he read. Now this chaplain is doubtless a good man, and may have some excellent qualifications for his office. He is, it is to be presumed, a philanthropist. Yet he is so much under the control of the spirit of dogmatism that he forgets the common courtesies that are due from one philanthropist to another, and forgets also, as the editor of a religious newspaper well puts it, that "even convicts have some rights which a chaplain is bound to respect," and that, as an officer of the State, with a salary which comes from taxing all the people of the State, he has no just nor legal right to confine the religious instruction of the inmates of the prison within the limitations of his own theology. This, I believe, is a specimen of Methodist dogmatism. But all through Christendom, and to some extent in all the sects, we may see proofs of the same spirit,—ministers restrained from uttering their real convictions from fear of losing their pulpits, and the means of supporting their families; school teachers, professors in colleges, newspaper editors and writers, public lecturers, condemned to keep their religious opinions silent, or lose their positions and the popular favor; even business men made to feel by many of their patrons that, if they want business, they must subscribe to, or at least not oppose, certain theological beliefs. There are men of public reputation in this city of New York who will not dare to speak on the platform of this Free Religious Convention, though their convictions and sympathies are here, because, if they do, they know it will be at the sacrifice of their public influence in their special spheres of labor. It would not be right to charge them all with moral cowardice (though it is to be feared there is too much of this), for they may not think it worth while to give up a life-career, in which they may accomplish much public good, for the sake of an hour's expression of their opinions on religious themes, so long as they have not a special mission for the propagation of these opinions. But the fact that they do abstain from this expression of their religious views, because they see it will be at the cost of their public usefulness in their chosen careers, tells volumes against the character and power of the ecclesiastical dogmatism that still rules in Christendom. That learned, cultivated, philanthropic, and noble men should thus be silenced in respect to the utterance of their religious views, or else be compelled to vacate their places of general public usefulness, is proof that even in this country there prevails a spiritual despotism, the machinery of which, though less external and material than formerly, is still potent to accomplish its ends. Dogmatism is simply despotism in religion; and it prevails wherever effort is made to maintain or to extend religious beliefs by any other processes or appeals than by arguments addressed to reason. This is the essence of dogmatism. And the practical bane of it is, that it reckons ecclesiastical conformity of belief as of more importance than sound thinking or true living.

II. Turn now to sectarianism, a kindred evil. Sectarism, indeed, is only one of the phases of dogmatism. Sectarism is dogmatism organized; dogmatism in its working-dress. Dogmatism is the root from which the sectarian feeling springs. We can hardly conceive that there would be sects in religion, did not men think that certain religious beliefs are all-important, and that it is necessary to convert all mankind to the acceptance of them. Did people simply wish to come together for spiritual incitement and elevation, for moral culture, and for doing philanthropic work, sects could not flourish. It is when these moral, spiritual, and philanthropic objects are subordinated to, or are regarded as involved in, belief in some theological dogma that the sectarian spirit arises. Then the main object of religious association is not moral, spiritual, philanthropic, but doctrinal, and all those who believe in the doctrine must be organized to work together to defend and propagate it. Thus a sect is built up. First, a doctrine,—and a doctrine conceived as all-important, and necessary to be believed by all men,—and then the sect as the guardian of the doctrine. The guardian becomes, therefore, as important as the doctrine, and the associated believers give themselves, heart and soul, to building up the guardian-sect. They have no philanthropic interests apart from that. They look at humanity only through the eyes of sect. They see no hope for mankind save in that little section of the religious world where their congregation worships. They endeavor to shape the forces of education and learning so as to hold them to their own ecclesiastical uses. No grist goes by, from whatever source it comes, that they do not endeavor to turn it to their mill.

But, it may be said, the fact of the existence of sects, whether of the great sects that divide the faith of the world, or of the smaller sects into which the religions divide, is not wholly an evil fact. And this is true. Sects, like religions, grow out of certain natural causes, and are adapted to certain natural, historical exigencies. Moreover, they indicate a certain mental activity, and mark, by the order of their development, pretty accurately the line of the progress of thought in religion. And if this were all, there were little or no evil to complain of. But a distinction has to be made between what we may call sect, and sectarianism. A sect may be a very harmless—nay, a very necessary, thing. When it comes as an organized band of protesters against some harmful dogma, or superstition, or, still better, as a band of affirmers of some new spiritual truth, and of workers for humane ends on some higher and broader platform than the old Church has allowed, then a sect may do a very useful and noble service. But such a movement, if true to its own impelling spirit, can hardly fall into sectarianism. A religious organization becomes sectarian only when it endeavors to draw a line in respect to theological opinion, so as to exclude somebody, or some thought, from its fellowship. Then, it assumes that some doctrine has been found that is better than the spirit of truth-seeking, and it sets itself to propagate that doctrine, and to build itself up for that purpose rather than for the broader purpose of human welfare. And this is the spirit and the evil of sectarianism; it is the putting of denominational views and objects before the interests of truth and humanity,—the putting of a belief which has the little stamp of some church upon it before the broad truth which carries upon it the free stamp of rational thought—the only authentic seal of Infinite Intelligence to the finite.

And who can honestly say that this evil of sectarianism does not still largely prevail, in Christendom and elsewhere? Modified and mollified from what it once was, there is still but too abundant evidence of its existence. Such movements as that represented in the Evangelical Alliance are pointed out as proof that the sectarian spirit is decaying. And among the denominations represented in that Alliance, in their relations to each other, this may have some truth. But then these denominations hold, substantially, the same theological system of belief,—the Protestant Evangelical interpretation of Christianity. And one of the avowed objects of their union is to defend their common Protestant view of Christianity against the power of the Roman Catholic church on the one hand, and their common Evangelical view of it against the inroads of Rationalism on the other. In other words, the signs are that they have come together for self-defence, and perhaps, also, for a more effective, offensive warfare, rather than that the sectarian spirit has died out among them. Towards the world outside of their lines they are as sectarian as ever. So also of the smaller and more local exhibitions of fellowship among these same sects. They seem to be rather an alliance for a stronger common defence of the dogmas on which they all stand, than an ascent to an unsectarian platform. What is more sectarian in their general management and spirit than the Young Men's Christian Associations in this country, the constitutions of which make a quote of membership, by admitting as "active" members—that is, members who are permitted to have anything to do with the election of officers and management of business—only such as are of Evangelical doctrine? And how much this sectarian spirit mingles with benevolent enterprises everywhere, and interferes with their successful working, the lover of humanity knows but too well.

People who believe in the same objects of charity are kept apart and weak because of sectarian differences and jealousies, when they might be so strong in good works, if they would only stand together.

The sects do, it must be allowed, as sects, no inconsiderable amount of charitable work. But the drawback to such charity is that there is always danger of its being subordinated to some ecclesiastical purpose. The Roman Catholic church does not institute its many charities so much for the sake of the welfare of those who are to be helped, as for the sake of the Lord; and this "for the sake of the Lord" is too apt to mean for the sake of a certain dogma about the Lord, or for the sake of a church where he is supposed to be best served. When any charity is established by a sect, and its management put designedly and exclusively into the hands of a sect, it is almost inevitable that it should be so conducted as to promote the interests of a sect. And this end, though it may not be avowed, is yet doubtless the real intention; else, why the carefulness to keep the management in the hands of the sect?

Now, if the benevolent sentiment which is thus harnessed to sectarian objects indirectly, and if the zeal for human welfare, the moral earnestness, the consecration of purpose, the learning, the talent, the property, which are now spent directly on promoting sectarian dogmas and sectarian interests, could be emancipated from these uses, and put to service in some rational, broad, well-considered way, in harmony with the enlightened methods of the nineteenth century, for the improvement of human society, what a power would be wielded for the good of mankind! When the churches forsake their sectarian strifes, their disputes about dogma, and ritual, and tradition, and band their forces together for the simple promotion of truth and righteousness, then the great problems of social misery and crime, which now perplex and darken society, will be more than half solved. Then we shall have a church in which science and philanthropy can join hands with faith, not so much to point men away from their ills and sorrows to a future heaven, as to help make for them a heaven here and now on earth.

III. But there is another foe, also within the limits of the Church itself, with which rational religion has to contend,—superstition. This is a more subtle enemy, quite as common, but not so easy to define. It has its source close by the primal fountain of religion itself. For religion, dealing with those relations that connect the finite intelligence with things that are infinite and beyond comprehension, necessarily shades off from solid and palpable truths to the region of mysteries. Hence, it is safe to say, that there has never been a religion which did not have its superstitions; and not only have them, but cherish and defend them as among its valuable traditions; nor is it always easy to distinguish the real faith from the superstition. Verbally, we may define superstition as faith resting on no solid basis, either of intuition or experience; it is faith up in the air,—faith that runs into fancy, into mere imagination, and chimeras. It is the spirit of excessive credulity in religion. Religion has had to contend in its career with the spirit that believes too little,—the spirit of denial and scepticism; but it has also had to contend with the spirit that believes too much,—which is superstition. And this foe within its own borders has done it quite as much harm as the more open foe of infidelity without. It is because religion has been compromised by the prevalence of superstitious beliefs and practices in the churches, that it has now fallen to such an extent out of harmony with the enlightened mind of the age. While ecclesiastical authorities have been nursing the superstitions, under the delusion that they were a protection of faith, these superstitions have really been sucking the life out of faith, so far as the churches are concerned, since genuine faith must always be in vital union with some living thought. And hence a rational faith, which must of necessity adjust itself continually to the demands of new thought, finds itself continually in conflict with this disposition of the Church to let superstitions alone, and even to cherish and defend them.

And we have no need to look far to find the proofs that superstition is still a present power in the Church. The Roman Catholic church, itself a mass of superstitions from foundation to top, has just given, in the pilgrimage to the French shrine of St. Marie Alacoque, to the world a new illustration of the ease with which the devotees of that church will respond to any demand upon their credulity; and the American Catholic Review, in an article encouraging Americans to organize a similar pilgrimage, frankly says all the minor details of the plan are easy of settlement "as soon as it is evident that a sufficient number" will join in showing to the world, what we are all, on this side of the Atlantic, so well aware of, that American Catholics are just as superstitious and just as medieval as their European brethren, and no more so." But Protestants, though they may not so frankly avow it, have their superstitions too, and cannot throw many stones at the Catholics on this point. A few months ago, at the time of heavy rains in England, a special prayer was prepared for the use of the clergy of the Established Church, petitioning the Almighty for a cessation of the floods. The prayers were begun, or were about to begin, when some farmers, alarmed for their future prosperity, petitioned the authorities of the Church that the prayers might cease and the rains go on, because, though the rain had been abundant, it had not yet sufficiently drenched the soil so as to reach all the springs and make up for the severe drought of previous years. The farmers, in this case, had the advantage of the clergy in their better understanding of the actual earthly conditions of the problem; but both alike appear to have believed that the prayers, if offered, would be potent to change the natural laws of the universe. In Boston there is a hospital, under Protestant Evangelical auspices, the managers of which affirm that it is supported wholly by prayer to God, never by appeals for aid from man. And how many people there are who would reject such a belief as this as a superstition not to be credited for a moment, who yet like to think that Nature's laws may sometimes be turned aside, either by their solicitation or by some special favor of the Almighty, so as to bring exemption to themselves or their households from some threatening peril by accident or disease! Then there are the superstitions concerning the Bible, and Sunday, and so-called sacred edifices, often preventing the best human use of them all, because it is thought they are in some way the Lord's, as other books and days and houses are not. And must we not begin to call a superstition that central and still powerful doctrine of Evangelical faith, by which it is believed that a man's sin to-day is washed away by the blood of a holy man who died in Judea near two thousand years ago? In the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance the other day, a converted Brahmin from India said that he was first turned toward Christianity by his reason beginning to question the possibility of many of the legends and traditions he had accepted for truth; and then he went on to laud the Bible and its plan of salvation by Calvary as the one authentic revelation of God in which he now implicitly trusted. I could not help asking, as I read his speech, how his reason should not equally question the stories of the sun standing still, of a man ascending in a fiery chariot to heaven, of water turned to wine, and the dead raised miraculously to life, which make a part of his present accepted Revelation. He had thrown off one superstition, and made some advance, but clearly had not risen above all superstition by coming out of Brahminism into Christianity. And so it is with all religious faith that does not keep the full companionship of reason. The faith that fastens yesterday's crude knowledge on its elbows will inevitably find superstition clinging to its skirts to-morrow. It is only by keeping pace with advancing thought that faith can keep itself clean from superstition. Superstition—to use a rather homely comparison—is faith's cast-off skin. Many people pick up the skin, and appear to think that they have the faith, forgetting that the sloughed garment only indicates that a new spring has come, and that the life has passed on in fresher form.

We see, then, what formidable opposition rational religion has to meet in the limits of the Church itself. In treating such a topic it has been necessary, of course, to speak chiefly in the line of criticism and negation. It will fall to others, before these meetings close, to show more of the positive and constructive side of the Free Religious movement. For they greatly mistake who suppose that this Free Religious movement is only denial and destruction. It destroys and it constructs; and it only destroys that it may construct. And so important do I deem it that we should bear this other side in mind that I am loth to conclude without briefly indicating how even this topic comes to its natural terminus, not in negations, but in the most positive assertion of a constructive power. For what, in human history, has been more constructive than religion? And what, again, in human history, and in human society to-day, is more constructive than rational thought or reason? Will they be less constructive when put together? And this, the putting of religion and reason together, is the point I have aimed at in this address; and it is the point towards which the Free Religious movement aims. Those who are engaged in this movement, looking behind and around them, find indeed much to criticise and oppose; but looking within and before them, they hardly know what the words, destruction and negation mean; and if their work ends without bringing into themselves, and into human society, a positively constructive force, they will greatly miss their goal. They profess to hold a form of faith which does not harbor these intestine foes of which I have spoken; a faith that is open on all sides to reason,—that does not fear but courts the advance of science,—that is ready to join hands for the promotion of truth and right with all earnest souls of whatever creed or race; a faith that cares for no dogma so much as it cares for personal integrity of character, for no book or tradition so much as for true thought, for no church so much as for humanity; a faith that expects no boon of salvation other than that which is found in the wholeness of a pure heart and a good life. They, then, of all men, are under obligation to show their faith by their works. They profess to have no other dependence than right living,—right living and those eternal laws of beneficence by which right living brings felicity as its natural product. They must see to it, then, that they set their own lives, and, so far as depends on them, the life of society, into line with these laws. The faith of others may be allowed to speak of human righteousness as "filthy rags;" but they must clothe themselves with that righteousness as the only garment that will admit them to heaven. Others may look for a heaven purchased for them through the toil and sacrifice of another being; they can look for no heaven, here or hereafter, save that which they themselves create through the pure purposes of their own hearts and the resolute uprightness of their own deeds, and the aid of that Power—call it Person or call it Force—which works in and through all genuine human work.

PAUL GOWER.

OF
ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XXXV.

IN WHICH PAUL GOWER AND RICHARD SABIN AMUSE THEMSELVES.

Having provided both Paul and his friend with employment—which, if not of a very high order, yet served as a stepping-stone to better work—I shall pass over some months of their existence with no more detail than their every-day character seems to demand. It must be an exceptional career, nowadays, which has not its intervals of routine and monotony: Gil Blas in the nineteenth century would be next to an impossibility; and our friends' lives were oftentimes as commonplace as those of other people; though, indeed, their labors on the Porcupine necessarily involved a certain amount of amusement and novelty to themselves, if not to the public. But anything pursued as a business inevitably partakes of the nature of work; and fun-makers by profession are generally rather more serious individuals than the rest of the community.

It was, however, by no means an unpleasant life that the two young men began to lead in New York City. We may be sure that their devotion to pen and pencil was not of such an engrossing nature as to prevent them from availing themselves of the many opportunities for improving their acquaintance with men and things in that metropolis. If they worked hard—as, to do them justice, they sometimes did—they knew how to play, also. Sabin's capacity for social enjoyment has already been mentioned; while Paul owed himself such an amount of arrears in pleasure and self-assertion that, with the means at command and nobody to check him, the wonder perhaps was that he did not turn out a rake and a reprobate. With a youth of less thoughtful and sensitive disposition, this had been a very natural transformation; but though his appetite for amusement occasionally led him into queer places, and very promiscuous company, it never was rank enough to batten upon garbage, and seldom brought worse cause for repentance than could be relieved with soda-water. Very likely he might have yielded to temptation, if it had come in more inviting shapes than it did, but never having succumbed, he found resistance the less difficult: it is the first step that costs, always. A modest, ingenious youth, of no more than average animalism, is often as shamefaced as a girl, and has an unspeakable repugnance towards conscious, deliberate sin. Besides, he was in love: and without endorsing the hyperbole of George Sand—"Les anges ne sont plus sur es que le cœur d'un jeune homme qui aime en vérité"—I think it must be admitted that one of the best conservators of youthful morality is an honest, romantic passion, let it be never so unwise or irrationally bestowed. The reflection, What would she think or say? is a far better curb than, What should I think of myself afterwards? in thousands of instances.

The friends, then, took their share of town pleasures, like other young men, delighting to explore the various phases of life in New York, very much as George Warrington and Arthur Pendennis are described as doing in London, in the history of the latter. Their connection with the Porcupine, and the acquaintances it brought them, supplied an open sesame to all sorts of experiences on the free-and-easy side of American existence, which are never more accessible than to gentlemen of the press, even of such moderate pretensions as those attaching to a shifty comic paper: indeed, journalism in the United States is a kind of free-masonry, having its lodges in every town, recognized everywhere, and entitling the initiated to innumerable good offices and social privileges. Thus, though not very important persons, either in their own conceit, or the opinion of the community, they were admitted as belonging to the rank and file of the fourth estate, which is nowhere so omnipotent, whether for good or evil, as in this republic. They had the run of a great many newspaper offices, knew the editors, critics, and reporters, were hail-fellow-well-met with the rising generation of artists, took drinks and exchanged nods with actors, hobnobbed with local politicians (always the most affable of men), and established an extensive intimacy with the proprietors of various bar-rooms, taverns, and restaurants. They frequented the theatres, concert-saloons, and German lager-beer gardens, visited sailors' dance houses, and, in company with the police, made the rounds of the Five Points, Cow Bay, and the Fourth Ward, finding, indeed, more of wretchedness, squalor, and poverty than "character" in all but the last; for the old diabolic saturnalia of the first—once a veritable New York cour des miracles—are, happily, long obsolete. They devoted a night, under the pilotage of a friend, to the gaming-houses, including not only the stylish faro-palaces on Broadway, but the more ignoble haunts of the "tiger," the "tin-pot" establishments of Chatham Street and the Bowery—where Dick ventured fifty cents and, in the course of half an hour, actually won twenty-six dollars, which he subsequently spent on a supper at Florence's. They saw a terrier kill his hundred rats in eight minutes, thirty-eight seconds, at Harry Jennings', in White Street, and several dog-fights. In accordance with an invitation from a waiter at Sweeney's, they attended a cock-pit where the illegal "sports" were, of course, conducted privately. They witnessed a sparring-exhibition in the rear of a tavern in Broome Street, and, going under the protection of a gentleman attached to the Ripper newspaper, neither had their pockets picked, nor were personally maltreated. They went out nocturnally with the harbor-police, coasting the piers and wharves of the two rivers, and taking nothing by their enterprise but a wetting, as the weather proved too bad for amphibious rascality to be stirring. They shared in a week's cruise down the bay, and about the shores of Staten and Long Islands, in a yacht owned by a jolly engraver, or, as he preferred to call himself, a "woodpecker," who now contracted for the Porcupine work, the whilom obscurers of the office-windows being superseded. In a three-days' ramble they explored the rocky Palisades of the glorious Hudson, a delightful excursion, involving much climbing, sketching, and general vagabondizing; also, I regret to say, the stealing of a roadside turkey, which Sabin knocked over with his stick, and which was subsequently cooked and eaten by our friends, before retiring to a hayloft, wherein they passed the night: also a narrow escape from a sudden Nemesis in the shape of a copperhead snake, in an attempt to scale the cliffs immediately opposite Yonkers. In short, omitting further details, they improved their time so thoroughly that Paul, at least, beheld more of American manners and customs during his first three months' sojourn in New York than he had of his own countryfolks in thrice that number of years in London.

While he was thus showing his sense of the value of his father's advice about getting on in life—of course justifying himself by the assumed necessity for seeing it in his new calling—certain events were transpiring at his boarding-house, or in connection with a young lady there resident, which, though comparatively insignificant in themselves, were yet destined to influence the course of this history. Some of them are so much a sequel to what has gone before that they might be anticipated without any great stretch of ingenuity on the part of the reader.

In the first place, within a couple of weeks after the departure of Mr. Fox for Baltimore—whither he went very unwillingly, as distrusting what was in store for him—Miss Livingston chose to break with her admirer, in as off-hand and unceremonious a manner as she had contracted the engagement—if it deserved the name. The epistolary abilities upon which he had prided himself only served to accelerate his fate, for he wrote such long letters, both to the girl and her mother—flowery, verbose compositions, abounding with the egotistic personal pronoun—that the recipients found it too much trouble to answer them, especially as Miss Lizzie spelt very badly and her mamma liked to use her tongue better than her pen, though she kept an idiotic diary, mainly devoted to the idolization of Rebecca Livingston. So poor Charley's letters were generally neglected, after being read aloud for the amusement of his late fellow-boarders. Then he telegraphed to know the reason why, and offended Miss Lizzie by directing his message to "Mrs. Charles Fox," and by ornamenting his envelopes with sealing-wax "kisses," which she called putting all the sentiment outside. Also she affected resentment at being made love to through the medium of her mother—an accusation really justified by her suit-or's correspondence—and advised him to transfer his addresses to "Widow Livingston," with which suggestion all intercourse terminated. "Any stick," the adage informs us, "is good enough to beat a dog;" the little coquette was tired of her admirer, and, lacking the stimulant of personal propitiation, determined to be rid of him; she had begun in caprice and ended in wilfulness. And from the circumstance that, in less than a month afterwards, Paul got a lively letter from Mr. Fox containing self-congratulations on "his escape," and also an enthusiastic description of the charms of a certain widow, "who owned no end of niggers and a cotton plantation in South Carolina," and whom the writer proposed to adore, henceforth and eternally,—it may be inferred that his throwing over didn't hurt him much, and that he consoled himself as speedily as he had on a former disappointment, according to his own confession.

WE ARE OFTEN told of the "good old times" when religion was in its palmy days and infidelity scarce. But we are thankful that we didn't live then and print the Investigator, or we might have been served like the poor friar mentioned in the following paragraph:—

Bill for Hanging and Boiling a Friar.—"Tadpole" writes as follows to the Kentish Observer:—"In the present age of religious tolerance and high price of labor, the following may not be uninteresting. It is extracted from an old magazine, and is an authentic copy of a document of the date: 'Account of the hanging and parboiling of Friar Stone at Canterbury in 1539. Paid for half a ton of timber to make a pair of gallows for to hang Friar Stone, 2s. 6d.; to a carpenter for making the same gallows, and the dray, 1s. 4d.; to a laborer that digged the holes, 3d.; other expenses of setting up the same, and carriage of the timber from Stablegate to the dungeon, 1s.; for a hurdle, 6d.; for a load of wood, and for a horse to draw him to the dungeon, 2s. 3d.; paid two men that sat at the kettle and parboiled him, 1s.; to three men that carried his quarters to the gates and sat them up, 1s.; for halsters to hang him, and Sandwich cord, and for screws, 1s.; for a woman that scowered the kettle, 2d.; to him that did execution, 3s. 8d.; total, 14s. 8d.'—Investigator."

AN EXPLANATION.

[From the Christian Register, Nov. 1.]

In the Register of last Saturday, a correspondent quotes from a telegraphic report of the recent Convention of the Free Religious Association, in New York, the incident in which a gentleman in the audience, who desired to oppose some of the opinions by the chairman, and then asks, "Have the spirit and methods of the Evangelical Alliance captured the Free Religious Association?" The reporter who thought it worth while to send that fact over the wires, ought to have thought it worth while to send the chairman's explanation, made at the same session a few moments later. He said, in substance, as follows: "We have not, in arranging this Convention, provided for, or advertised, a general discussion, to be participated in miscellaneously by any persons who may chance to be present. We have selected certain topics which we wished to present to the public, and engaged certain speakers to present them. Those speakers are here to meet their engagements. To give up the time to others would be to break our engagements with them, and with the audiences that have come here in response to our advertisements; and would probably prevent our carrying out our advertised programme. Were we in the majority, our principles might require, and we should think it but fair, to give up some portion of our time to the opinions of the minority. But the majority have been stating their opinions for three hundred years and more; they have almost all the churches and newspapers at their command; they have just held possession of New York for ten days, and all the papers in the country have been reporting their views, with not a word on the other side. Now we have hired this hall, and rescued these few hours from other duties, for the purpose of presenting this other side, which gets such a meagre representation anywhere else. I put it, therefore, to the common sense and the common fairness of people, whether we can be charged with illiberality if we do not give up any portion of these hours to the use of our opponents."

The audience evidently, from their applause, approved of this decision. Some of us on the platform would, perhaps, have decided differently, willing to give an opponent even more than he had any just right to ask; but when we afterwards learned how many persons in the audience had sent up to the chairman requests to be allowed to speak, we all, I believe, were ready to pronounce it, at least, a wise, practical decision. Had the privilege been accorded in one case, it could hardly have been denied in another.

Certainly, neither the principle of free speech, nor a free platform, requires that the time of a Convention shall be given up to such chance discussion as may arise in a public assembly. And the Convention Committee of the Free Religious Association, it is hoped, will never do so foolish a thing as to hire a central and costly hall in a large city for a public meeting, and then abandon the meeting to whatever speakers may choose or chance to come there to utter their views. Nor is there any antagonism between this position and what your correspondent quotes from our "First Annual Report," as he will, perhaps, himself see if he looks into it a little further. The Association still "invites people of all religious names, and of no religious name, to come together as equal brothers, and confer with one another on the highest interests of mankind,"—though, as a score or more of letters in my possession testify, it has found great difficulty in securing Orthodox representatives at such conferences, and has latterly, in consequence, nearly abandoned the attempt as a waste of effort.

Yours truly, W. J. POTTER,
Sec'y F. R. A.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

For sometime past our citizens have been called upon by children with a subscription paper headed "Paul Had a Dream." Several thousands have been induced to give small sums of money to help what seemed to be a good object, several Sabbath-school superintendents having unfortunately given the subscription papers their sanction under a mistaken impression. It was supposed that the money was to assist the American Bible Society, when, to the regret of the contributors, it was found that the money went to the American Bible Union, a sectarian Bible organization. The County Bible Society took measures to enlighten the public on the subject, and issued a circular, signed by the President of the Society and the pastors of sixteen of the churches of the city, as follows:—

The friends of the Bible Cause, and members of the Albany County Bible Society, have learned that the representative of a new Baptist society, called the "American Bible Union," is in this vicinity, and, through the agency of children in our Sabbath-schools, appeals to the public for funds to aid in circulating their new sectarian version. For more than sixty years the Albany County Bible Society has been employed in the distribution of the Bible, and the American Bible Society, to which it is an auxiliary, receives aid through our organization to circulate the same Scriptures wherever destitution exists, both in this country and in distant lands. In view of the denominational nature of the new movement, and of the book circulated by them, and the fact that many of the solicitors, as well as contributors to its funds, are not aware of its sectarian nature, we feel called upon, as friends of the Bible Cause and of all honorable means to circulate the Word, to discourage the means employed by a sectarian union to supplant the work of the American Bible Society, which is composed of all Evangelical Christians, by whatever name they are known.

The accompanying communication from the General Secretary of the American Bible Society will furnish important information upon the subject:—

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK, May 13, 1873.
Your favor of the 12th has been received. The "American Bible Union" is an organization made up of that portion of the Baptist denomination which has undertaken the revision by themselves of the Bible. The peculiarities of that version, I presume you understand, are such as to confine it very much to that denomination, or rather that portion of it having the work in hand, which is said to be less than one-half of their own people. It is said that over half a million dollars have been expended upon the revision thus far, and only a portion of the Bible has been put in circulation. Of course, our society does not co-operate in the work in any way, and has no interest in or sympathy with it, and there are some annoying things about it, one of which is that to which you refer—to allow on their part that Society or its work to become identified with our Society and work in many places, by merely presenting the Bible Cause, without reference to their denomination, or the peculiarities of the version by which that Association is known. We have had letters before of inquiry from other places, and in reference to the very person you mention, I think, and his plan for raising money for Bible distribution in the South, etc., and he may in such cases distribute the old version so far as I know. But what I have said will inform you as to what the "Union" was organized for, and the version they circulate, and from this you can judge with what favor to regard their representative man in Albany.

Since writing, one of our Agents from the West has just come in, and says that the "Union" circulate only their own version of the Scriptures.

Yours, very truly,

C. F. Rowz, Gen. Sec. A. B. S.

The officers and teachers of the Hudson avenue Methodist Sunday-school directed their superintendent to pay the moneys collected to the agent of the American Bible Society, in order that they might not be diverted from the object intended by the donors, and the Quarterly Conference at the recent session approved the action of the teachers, by a vote of their number nearly unanimous.

Mr. Barnitz, the reputed agent of this movement, has been in Troy during the past month, and taken considerable money from that city.

The Philadelphians publish in the papers of that city the following:—

CAUTION EXTRAORDINARY!

For the benefit of Methodist Sabbath-schools, and others whom it may concern, the Preachers' Meeting of Philadelphia, after careful inquiry by committee, request the publication of the following, which sufficiently explains itself:—

1st. That the American Bible Union is composed chiefly, perhaps wholly, of persons of the Baptist faith and order.

2d. That its object is a new translation of the Holy Scriptures in which the words "immerse, immersion," &c., are substituted for the words "baptize, baptism," &c.

3d. That Rev. W. R. Barnitz seems to be an authorized representative of this Association, subscribing himself "Sunday-school Secretary of the American Bible Union."

4th. That Rev. Mr. Barnitz, avoiding the pastors and proper church authorities, has obtained access to several of our Sabbath-schools, and by representing that the American Bible Union embraces Christians of every denomination, has, through the children, obtained money for the ostensible purpose of sending Bible primers to the freedmen of the South.

5th. That two members of a committee appointed had personal interviews with Mr. Barnitz, expressing to him freely their convictions of the impropriety of his course; that he attempted justification, and declared his purpose to continue therein; that he made two appointments to meet the committee, but failed in both.

6th. That failing to meet the committee, he addressed to them a communication accompanied with sundry documents, to which, on the third of September, the committee returned answer, stating clearly the objections to the course pursued, and demanding that the money thus collected from Methodist schools be returned to the schools from which it was collected, and that he should discontinue this form of his agency among us.

To this, up to December 10th, no reply has been received.

The committee, therefore, recommended, and the Preachers' Meeting ordered, that the essential facts above stated should be published for the protection of other schools and churches against similar operations.—Albany Express, June 16.

THE FIRE-WORSHIPPERS.

In an interesting letter from India to the Syracuse Courier, a correspondent signing the initials "N. F. G." says: "You have all heard of the Parsees. They are the Jews of Bombay. They are a race that were excluded from Persia as the Jew have been from many countries. Here they located. They are very industrious, and are a peculiar people. They are the traders. They buy and sell the cotton. They are the brokers, the money-lenders, and shavers. They never mingle with others. They have their own schools, and in their way are highly educated. They take care of their own poor. They have great wealth, and have elegant villas on Malober Hill, the most fashionable part of the city. They drive splendid horses and ride in elegant carriages. If the ladies and children appear on the street, they are dressed in silk. I never saw children so elegantly dressed anywhere else. Many of the young ladies are very beautiful, but are never allowed to receive visits from any but their own race. They are fond of amusements, and have a theatre of their own. They are fire-worshippers. When the labors of the day are over, they are seen along the shores of the sea, facing the setting sun, with their hands clasped, repeating their prayers. They have very peculiar notions of life, but their cemetery is more peculiar still. It is different from all others. We made a visit to their cemetery, not knowing at the time that no one was admitted. It is a large tract on the best part of Malober Hill. It is very valuable now, but was purchased many years ago. We made application at the gate for admission, and were refused. We appealed to a young Parsee, who happened to be passing. He was dressed in silk, and very gentlemanly in appearance. He said that no Europeans were admitted. We told him that we were not Europeans but Americans. He said he would be very happy to oblige Americans, but could not; but did consent that we should go up the road outside the inner wall, and have a view of the city and bay. The sentinel took us along the winding road, and a rupee given to him acted like a charm. It opened all the gates and passed the police. There were no Parsees in sight to stand in our way, and we entered the prohibited inclosures. These grounds are surrounded by a wall twenty feet high, and have been used for a great many years by this strange people. There are no monuments in the cemetery. There are three round towers about fifty feet in diameter, and fifty to sixty feet high. On the top of these towers there is an iron grate. The dead are brought to the gate and delivered to the priests, and the friends depart. The priests prepare the corpse and lay it on the grate, and it is devoured by the vultures, and the bones drop through the grate into the charnel house below. These towers or vaults are called the "Towers of Silens." We saw hundreds of vultures sitting on these towers, and the sentinel told us that they would take all the flesh from the bones of a corpse in an hour. We asked why these towers? The sentinel, pointing to one, said, "Parsee with plenty of money put there;" to another, "Parsee with but little money put there;" and the other, "Parsee with no money put there." The sentinel said when a corpse is placed on the grate, the strife and the noise of the vultures is frightful, and could be heard for a long distance. We saw those "Towers of Silens," and do not care ever to be any nearer.

PREAMBLE.

WHEREAS, we recognize that man is a progressive being, and that a higher standard of morality and religion than that set up by any of the popular systems of theology is imperiously demanded by the present advanced state of knowledge, and that a constant effort to attain to a higher development of all his faculties is a necessity of man's nature:

Therefore, we, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT:

ARTICLE 1st.—The name of this Association shall be the Free Religious Association of New Milford.

ARTICLE 2d.—The object of this Association shall be to give encouragement to free thought and expression on all moral and religious questions, and to promote the highest moral and religious welfare of its members and the community.

ARTICLE 3d.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.

ARTICLE 4th.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for this Association as its members shall from time to time see fit to adopt by their vote.

ARTICLE 5th.—Any person may become a member of this Association by subscribing his or her name to this agreement, and by contributing to its support; but membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his or her own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his or her relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or constitution of this Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief, or as defining the position of this Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief, or as interfering in any other way with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.

ARTICLE 6th.—The officers of this Association shall be a President, a Vice-President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee, consisting of five members, who shall be elected by a majority vote of this Association, and hold their offices for one year, or until others are elected to succeed them, and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to those offices. The President and the Secretary shall be ex officio members of the Executive Committee.

ARTICLE 7th.—These Articles may be amended at any meeting of this Association, by a majority vote of the members present, provided public notice of the Amendment has been given with the call for the meeting.

The movement which grew into this Association took place October 19, 1871. The foregoing articles were adopted September 23, 1873. The following ladies and gentlemen were elected officers, October 5, 1873, for the third year: Elliot Aldrich, President; Benjamin Sabins, Vice-President; Cyrus Barlow, Secretary; Richard Hart, Treasurer; Executive Committee: George W. Weed, Mrs. Harvey Grinnell, D. W. Rice, Mrs. Aaron Aldrich, Robert Shoemaker.

THE SECRET.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

On sacred leaf it is not writ,
Nor priest nor prophet telleth it;
The monastery's faded tome
Is silent as the catacomb.
From Judah's seers the secret's hid,
In vain we search the pyramid;
Yea, parchment scroll, and chiselled stone,
And tongue inspired, must leave unknown
The mystery that shall outlast
The future, and out-dates the past.
The voice of centuries proclaims,
Through birth and death-throes of great names,
'Mid crumbling of earth's altar-stones,
And powdering of martyrs' bones,
That Time hath not, nor man, divined
The mystic Unity of Mind.
Nor shall one soul to other show
How Godhead doth through Nature go, Intelligent in earth and sea,
The brain and heart enshrined in thee.
Though Plato think and Jesus feel Delight that neither may conceal,
Yet nor by this nor that can be Made known his source of joy to me.
But straight to me, though earth be dumb,
The streaming Life down full doth come;
Yet none can tell when, how begun,
Or tend I, with the Eternal One.
O secret mine! thy depth allures,
But prying heart of faith abjures.
'Tis not in trust, but direful need,
That souls make fast to settled creed.
Yet not for all of Bible-lore,
And all that churchmen ponder o'er,
Would soul of mine this peace exchange,
That's born of mystery so strange.
Not all the written word can match
The promises and hope I catch
As often as I do desecry
Some sign of present Deity.

Religion man may ne'er define,
But ever taste its sweets divine.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The following rule has been adopted with reference to subscriptions to THE INDEX, and will be observed on and after December 1, 1873:

THE INDEX will be discontinued to each subscriber immediately on the expiration of his term of subscription as marked by the printed mail-tag, unless the subscription is renewed in advance, or unless direct notice is received that the subscriber intends soon to renew it. But a bill will be sent to each subscriber a few weeks previous to the expiration of his term, in order that he may have an opportunity of renewing without suffering any interruption in the receipt of his papers.

GLIMPSES.

WHAT IS the difference? The Radicals believe in the "Perfect Man;" the Orthodox believe in the "Perfect Horse."

ALL EXCOMMUNICATED parties will please receive our congratulations. They will discover how comfortable it is to be "outside."

A WIDOW LADY in needy circumstances wishes to know if she can get employment as an agent in selling stereoscopes and stereoscopic views. Can any one name to us a reliable house engaged in that line of business? If so, we shall be obliged by receiving the information.

HOW CHARMINGLY INNOCENT is the Christian Register's conceit that all paragraph-writing was originally suggested by its own "Brevities"! Did it not furnish some useful hints at the creation? We are fully alive to the compliment it pays when it styles THE INDEX its "doubly imitative neighbor;" but modesty and truth both compel us to decline it. The pointlessness of the Register's "pious" is absolutely inimitable.

WHEN THE DEMAND is made by "infidels" that the "Free Religionists" declare "what they do or do not believe," we reply, Yankee-fashion: "What do 'infidels' believe?" Some of them are spiritualists and others materialists; some are deists, some pantheists, some atheists; and some hold opinions hard to classify. When the Investigator can tell us what all "infidels" believe, we can probably tell the Investigator what all "Free Religionists" believe. Let us be reasonable.

"WHAT WILL BE our religion in 1999?" inquires Florence Nightingale in Fraser's Magazine. She anticipates great political and ecclesiastical wars meanwhile, and notes the vast apparent reaction in favor of Catholicism in France and elsewhere; and she seems to be in no little doubt as to the future religion of the civilized world. But there is no ground for uneasiness. So long as the love of truth survives, the knowledge of truth cannot but increase; and no temporary retreat of the waves of progress will prevent the incoming of the tide.

LAST JUNE a singular case of Evangelical "sharp practice" (a severer term might be not unjustly used) came to light, involving the "American Bible Union" in a disreputable manner. As illustrating one of the most odious tendencies of sectarianism, it ought not to be overlooked. It is well known that the Baptists have been revising the Bible in the interest of their peculiar doctrine of "baptism by immersion;" but it is not so well known that the American Bible Union, composed mainly if not wholly of Baptists, for the sake of circulating their doctored translation of the Scriptures, have sent out agents who seek to introduce it surreptitiously, even to the extent of getting money under false pretences. These agents, without giving notice that their version of the Bible substitutes for the words "baptize, baptism," etc., the words "immerse, immersion," etc., collect money from Methodist and other Evangelical quarters as if for the "unsectarian" version, and refuse to refund it on the fraud becoming known! An article in another column from the Albany Express will give fuller information respecting this curious business.

IN A VERY appreciative letter on the New York Convention of the Free Religious Association, "H. P." writes to the Christian Register thus: "Another thing, too, was noticeable in all their speeches and papers; namely, that the Christianity which they dissected and condemned was the Christianity of Calvin, and not of Jesus." Not so. The doctrine of everlasting punishment, which was so pointedly referred to by Col. Higginson, was taught as explicitly by Jesus as by Calvin,—at least, if the gospels are credible. We wish that the austere fidelity of Calvin, who refused to be "wise above what is written," might be better followed by those who also profess to accept the New Testament as their guide. Either obey the "Master" and believe his teachings without mutilation, or else cease to keep up the hollow show of a discipleship which is only nominal.

PRESIDENT GRANT'S "recommendation" to the people of the United States to "meet in their respective places of worship," etc., etc., on Thursday, November 27, would be simply an impertinence, if made as a private individual. But when issued in the form of an official proclamation, signed by himself as President, and countersigned by Mr. Fish as Secretary of State, it becomes a violation of official duty, a usurpation of authority in things spiritual in flagrant disregard of the spirit of the United States Constitution. Much as we like the habit of "Thanksgiving" festivities, endeared as they are to every New Englander, at least, by tender memories of forms and faces no longer present, we look upon its official adoption by the United States government as a dangerous and pernicious precedent. If Thanksgiving Day is worth anything to the people, it will be spontaneously observed; if not, it ought to fall into desuetude. But President Grant is doing his best to throw the good old day into something worse than desuetude, by making it a patent reminder that Church and State are not wholly separated yet, as they ought to be. It is to be hoped that the government will keep its hands off Christmas.

THE NEW YORK Freeman's Journal (Roman Catholic) speaks out unequivocally in commenting on the St. Louis Convention of the Irish Benevolent Societies, an account of which we published last week. It says bluntly and pointedly: "'Heart culture' is a cant phrase of schools detestable to Catholic doctrine. But to say that State-Schoolism is capable of 'enlightening the intellect,' is to flatter present delusions at the cost of most certain fact. The human intellect is not enlightened, and cannot be, in regard to all those matters most necessary for it to learn—and without which all else it may gather up is but the chattering of idiots—without that Revelation of God to his creature, man, that tells the latter what he needs to believe, and what he needs to do, to attain the end for which God created him. Catholics do not want to put the Holy Scriptures into the hands of their children, or of the children of others, in schools. The Holy Scriptures are of Divine Inspiration, and are to be used as the Holy Catholic Church prescribes. Father Phelan put to the Convention a resolution, forked in its wording, but containing neither more nor less than the dogmatic teachings of the Holy Roman Catholic Church. For those that wilfully despise these teachings, there is no salvation. They who examine whether the Catholic Church tells truth or falsehood are not Catholics—they are, in terms, Protestants."

WE ARE VERY SORRY that the editor of the Investigator and his intelligent New York correspondent should feel hurt by anything said at the late Convention of the Free Religious Association. No one of the speakers there had the least intention, we are confident, of "giving the cold shoulder to Voltaire, Volney, Paine, and Materialists generally." Surely Mr. Frothingham's eloquent defence of these men, in his Beliefs of the Unbelievers, should set all doubts at rest so far as he is concerned. But even if individual speakers had really intended thus to abandon the cardinal principles of the Association, by which persons of all beliefs are welcome to its fellowship without any impertinent inquiries as to the nature of those beliefs, it should never be forgotten that no individual speaker is spokesman for the Association, which speaks for itself. In response to the request of "M. A." for an authoritative declaration of what the Association does and does not believe, we quote Article II. of its Constitution: "Membership in this Association shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone, and affect in no degree his relations to other associations; and nothing in the name or Constitution of the Association shall ever be construed as limiting membership by any test of speculative opinion or belief,—or as defining the position of the Association, collectively considered, with reference to any such opinion or belief,—or as interfering in any other way with that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being." That is the only "creed" of the Free Religious Association. It proclaims absolute freedom of thought and speech for all its members. It admits "godless materialists" just as cordially as godly Christians. It prescribes no condition of membership but the "desire to cooperate with the Association," and the annual payment of one dollar to the Treasury. It leaves each member to make his own creed as his own reason shall dictate, whether that creed be the creed of Athanasius, or of Paine, or of Charles Bradlaugh. Is not that intelligible? If not, we say with emphasis that the Association which is not broad enough to admit Charles Bradlaugh, Horace Seaver, or "M. A.," is not broad enough for us; and we believe the same would be said by Mr. Frothingham, Mr. Higginson, Mr. Potter, and every other member of the Free Religious Association.

THE "PARKER MEMORIAL MEETING HOUSE" was erected by the "Parker Memorial Meeting House Association," an incorporated body distinct from the "Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society" and the "Parker Fraternity," which again are distinct from each other. The "Association" is composed of individuals who united to form a stock company for the express purpose of providing a place of public meeting for the "Twenty-Eighth Congregational Society," which by the terms of the deed has exclusive and perpetual use of the main Hall on Sundays. The "Parker Fraternity" has likewise perpetual use of the lower Hall and adjacent rooms. The "Fraternity" holds stock, as such, in the "Association," and the "Society" proposes to invest the proceeds of its late Fair in the same manner. But the control of the main Hall, except on Sundays, is at present in the hands of the "Building Committee" of the "Association," who rent it for use by such parties as they see fit. The recent "dedication services," by which the Hall was devoted to free thought and free speech, were held by the "Society," and not by the "Association" or its "Building Committee;" and of course the dedication of the Hall by the "Society" to free thought and free speech could only be valid for such time as the "Society" controls it; namely, on Sundays. The "Association" has not so dedicated it, and is not bound by the "Society's" dedication; neither is the "Society" responsible for the "Association's" action. Many persons, however, are members of both at the same time, and the relations of the two are necessarily complicated. Such is the information we have acquired in answer to inquiries which were prompted by the recent refusal of the "Building Committee" to rent the main Hall to Mrs. Woodhull, for the purpose of speaking on "Labor Reform." It appears that the proprietors of the Hall organized for the sole object of giving a permanent home to Parker's Society, as the best memorial they could raise to Parker himself; and it would be unfair to judge their action as if they had promised to provide and maintain a free platform for all comers. Such a free platform ought to be found in every city and town of the country, open to any and every applicant who is pecuniarily responsible, without so much as asking what he or she desires to say; and we regret to see it stated that Mrs. Woodhull cannot find such a platform in Boston. We have very little sympathy with what Mrs. Woodhull inculcates, and still less with her reported manner of inculcating it; but we have absolute confidence in the wisdom of that policy which abolishes every conceivable restriction on free speech. Grant that you consider the principles advocated to be vile, immoral, and pernicious,—grant that the mode of advocating them is indecent, vulgar, and disgusting; none the less it is the surest way to put down such principles to let their defenders themselves talk them down. No committee can decide what the public ought to hear. If a speaker utters folly or worse, the public will find it out; but the right of free speech is so precious that neither prudential nor other considerations should stand in its way. It would probably be a very poor business investment to build a hall the renting of which should be absolutely irrespective of the sentiments to be uttered on its platform. No matter for that. Such a hall is needed everywhere, and it is with chagrin we learn that no such hall can be found in Boston.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Inquiries having been made whether the proceedings of the recent Convention, in New York, of the Free Religious Association will be published in pamphlet form, notice is hereby given that the Association does not propose to publish such a pamphlet. The essays read before the Convention are to be published in successive issues of THE INDEX, beginning last week with Mr. Frothingham's; and several of them will be printed there from the revised manuscripts of the authors. Mr. Parton's essay, on "The Taxation of Church Property," is also to be issued by the Association as a Tract; and possibly one or two others may be put into Tract form. But, beyond this, the proceedings will not be published by the Association. The pamphlet advertised in another column, containing a portion of the essays read at the Convention as reprinted from the valuable but incomplete report of the New York Tribune, is not authorized by the Association.

A CONFLICT OF CRITICISMS.

Both the Unitarian newspapers, the Liberal Christian and the Christian Register, in their issues of Saturday, October 18, have an extended notice of the Sixth Annual Report of the Free Religious Association, published several weeks ago. The notice in the Liberal Christian is a leading editorial article, more than two columns in length, and evidently written by Dr. Bellows. That in the Christian Register is in the department of Book-Reviews, but occupies a column and quarter in finer print. Both articles take up the pamphlet in detail, and are elaborate criticisms rather than mere general notices.

But there is a very marked conflict of judgment between the critics as to the intellectual merits of the contents of the pamphlet. The editorial in the Liberal Christian begins, for instance, as follows:—

"We do not envy the man's candor or Christianity who can read from beginning to end the hundred pages just published of 'Proceedings of the Sixth Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, held in Boston, May 29 and 30, 1873,' and rise from it with only a sneer on his face or a shrug of easy indifference in his shoulders. To find so many men of high intelligence, broad culture, poetic genius, and pure character, laying the most elaborate studies in religion upon the altar of freedom and truth is a phenomenon of the rarest interest and the gravest significance. We complain that physics and commerce have drawn all the finest talent out of the service of religion; that men of genius and taste have become indifferent to piety; that faith and awe and aspiration are departed! Here is a plain refutation of the slander. So much severe, earnest, honest thought about religion as is contained in this pamphlet, so much vital interest and concern for its themes, so much evidence of profound sincerity, are not to be easily found in any equal space in any religious literature of any time."

This is certainly very appreciative criticism of the intellectual ability manifested in the "Proceedings" as a whole; and the writer follows it up, in speaking of the addresses in detail, with saying something in high commendation of each, while objecting, only partially, to two of them for exhibiting a spirit somewhat too "contemptuous," and for a "Rabelais humor, which does not always escape the suspicion of malice and scorn." In fact, so far as regards sincerity of conviction, moral earnestness, talent for thinking and for expressing thought, profound interest and careful research in the vital themes of religion, those who took part in this Free Religious Convention could hardly ask for a more appreciative judgment, or for more generous praise than the writer of this article accords. A friend could scarcely praise more; from an opponent it comes as a handsome tribute not to be passed by without an equally just and generous recognition.

But very different is the judgment of the Christian Register critic. Speaking of the addresses as a whole, this is what he says:—

"Except those of Mr. Johnson and Mr. Longfellow, they don't strike us as especially able or interesting. Indeed, we must honestly say that, considering the occasion, they seem to us poor, and to add little or nothing to thought already commonplace upon their prevailing theme."

To this general disparaging opinion is subjoined a criticism in special disparagement of most of the addresses; and throughout the article, with the exception of what is said of two speakers, there is a tone very different from that cordial recognition of sincere aims and earnest thinking which marks the Liberal Christian leader. In fact, the Register writer seems to have risen from reading the Report in that spirit which the Editor of the Liberal Christian condemns,—namely, "with only a sneer on his face or a shrug of easy indifference in his shoulders." This, at least, well expresses what has been the general attitude of the Register towards the Free Religious Association. And this general spirit greatly detracts from the force of any of its special criticisms of the Association's proceedings,—renders them, indeed, nearly valueless. Criticism, of course, we do not deprecate. We criticize, and we expect to be criticised. But we have a right to ask that criticism be respectful and fair.

It is hardly necessary to add that the Liberal Christian does not approve of the main position of the Free Religious Association more than does the Register; and it closes its article (which the Register does not) with a critique of that position. On this point something may be said in another article. This week it is sufficient to call attention to the different tone and judgment of the two criticisms; and in such a conflict of the critics, the best practical advice probably is, that all who have any interest in the matter shall get the Report and judge for themselves which is right.

MR. BRADLAUGH AND THE "DAILY ADVERTISER."

The applause that followed Mr. Bradlaugh's reply to the Daily Advertiser, last Saturday evening, was a fitting rebuke to the course pursued by that respectable journal toward this eminent exponent and representative of English Republicanism. Before Mr. Bradlaugh came here, the Advertiser was careful to warn the people of Boston of the dangerous character of the orator who was presently to address them, and we were advised to snub him with a cold reception. Of course, everybody took the hint, and, on the occasion of Mr. Bradlaugh's first appearance, Music Hall was filled by an audience that only the Advertiser could summon. Every one wished to see and to hear this "author of blasphemous parodies," this "worst type of the English demagogue," so much dreaded by our motherly old journal. How Mr. Bradlaugh disappointed us is well known. His ability and eloquence, and especially his fairness and moderation, won for him a welcome rarely given by a Boston audience. His success was complete.

In despair, the Advertiser cast about for some means of escape from its humiliation, and, with its accustomed dexterity, pleaded an excuse for its folly that there are "two Bradlaughs." "Of Bradlaugh the communist, the leader of rioters in Hyde Park, the author and declaimer of burlesque litanies, the promoter of strife among the poor, the sympathetic audience of Music Hall saw nothing. There, he was no revolutionist, but simply a reformer."

Now Mr. Bradlaugh is not a man to be assailed with impunity, and in his own time he took occasion to deny these gratuitous slanders, and to challenge proof. Once more our virtuous journal tries its hand, and again it gasps, and flounders, and fails. "The personal allusions made to him," it says, "rested upon the authority of truthful witnesses, who are entirely familiar with his history, and of leading English journals in which his movements, during the last eight or ten years, have been recorded."

Such a flimsy justification of a savage personal attack is simply a disgrace to journalism. Until the "truthful witnesses" come forward with their evidence, Mr. Bradlaugh will claim, and the public will believe, that they exist only in the imagination of the discomfited editor. The reliance of Mr. Bradlaugh's reviewer, upon "leading English journals" to sustain his case, is singularly unfortunate. Very likely Mr. Bradlaugh's career for the last eight or ten years, as recorded by them, has been as bad as the Advertiser would desire to make it; but it is notorious that the policy of these same leading English journals, towards republicanism and its champions in England, has been that of persistent misrepresentation and abuse. Even the Advertiser admits that "many of them have reported him sometimes unfairly." Unfair treatment of unpopular movements, and their advocates, is notably a characteristic of "leading journals" on both sides of the Atlantic. No man of sane mind to-day would seriously consult the leading American journals (including the Boston Daily Advertiser), of twenty years ago, for trustworthy information concerning the anti-slavery movement, or the character of Mr. Phillips, Mr. Garrison, and other prominent abolitionists. Evidence from such a source would be utterly worthless; yet no more so than that upon which the Advertiser relies in its arraignment of Mr. Bradlaugh.

It may be that an instinctive hatred of Radicalism tempted Boston's usually careful and precise leading journal to make this unjustifiable assault upon the distinguished guest whom Boston delights to honor; but however this may be, the only escape from its present unenviable position is through a straightforward and manly retraction.

PRECEPT UPON PRECEPT.

If the kindly-intentioned critics of the Free Religious Association fail so signally to understand its drift, it is too much to expect that the unkindly-disposed will understand it better. Nothing could more thoroughly establish the necessity of the task the Association has undertaken than the comments of the "Evangelical" press on its recent Convention. The tone of sneering and vilification, the misrepresentation of arguments, the plump misstatements of fact, the perversion of reasoning, the gratuitous imputation of bad motives, and the travesty of opinions and sentiments, are worthy of the sectarian spirit in its worst days, and cause a fear that no power of good sense or good feeling will avail to put an end to its bigotry. As one reads the criticisms of the Orthodox organs, the task the Association has set for itself looks utterly desperate.

Mr. Beecher in the Christian Union—we conjecture that it is Mr. Beecher—means to do us justice; but he, though refraining from abuse, makes an objection which shows that he is as far as anybody from guessing what the aim of the Association is. If the Association, he says, would justify its existence, it must cease its warfare upon theological dogmas and ecclesiastical institutions, and show a new and better way of removing social evils! This is very much like objecting to the Peace Society that it does not reform the civil service, or to the Woman Suffrage Society that it does not procure cheaper postage, or to the Temperance Society that it does not hasten the return of specie payments, or to the Free Trade League that it does not supply better dwellings for the poor, or to the "Evangelical Alliance" that it suggests no plan for preventing yellow fever. Pray, when has the Free Religious Association professed to be a society for social reform? a new society for the cure of the ruptured and crippled, or for the prevention of cruelty to animals? If it had made such a profession, it is hardly fair to expect so much from it in so short a time. Seeing that Christianity has not reformed society in any single respect, or in any single locality, in two thousand years—during a great part of which time it has held undisputed sway—it is hard that a small company of innovators should be compelled to produce a new Eden in six years, and that in the teeth of all Christendom, with all the wealth, social influence, instituted power, there is!

But when did the Association ever profess to do, or to aim at doing, anything of the sort? For the one thousandth time it is asserted that the sole and single purpose of the Association is to assail sectarianism, superstition, ecclesiasticism and dogmatism, to weaken and break down, if possible, the barriers that divide parties, sects, cliques. In religion, to destroy the power of spiritual monopolies, to uncrown Romanist and Protestant popes, to disprove the pretensions of infallibility, to establish the essential identity of all religions, to show that religion, everywhere and always, is made of one stuff, to promote spiritual fellowship and brotherhood by exhibiting a deeper ground of union; in a word, to emancipate the soul of man from its bondage to the priestly, churchly, clerical, formal, and whatever other spirit it may be that produces narrowness, bigotry, and odium.

That is the purpose, and that is all the purpose. It is surely definite enough, and large enough, to justify a score of organizations. If this purpose could be accomplished, the Association would disband, though every evil that afflicts society—intemperance, pauperism, licentiousness, and the rest—instead of diminishing, were on the increase; just as the Anti-Slavery Society dissolved before the suffrage was gained for women, or the labor problem was solved.

We are not a social reform body. As individuals, we are interested in special reforms—all the special reforms. But, as members of the Free Religious Association, we are interested in one single reform—the spiritual anti-slavery reform.

Having said so much, as intelligibly as our limited vocabulary will allow, we will run the risk of confusing the minds of our critics by introducing another idea. It is this: that the business of reforming society, by abolishing its evils, had better be the soonest possible taken out of the hands of associations professing a religious aim, and transferred to other hands more competent to deal with it. If there is one thing that religious men, and particularly religious associations of men, have managed badly, it is social reform. They have succeeded in the course of time in so mixing and muddling every question connected with it, that the task of statufg it is all but hopeless. They have not only removed no evils, and pointed out no way of removing evils, and suggested no philosophy explaining the principle on which evils might be removed, but they have upset all reasonable plans, and made every element of the problem in general and in particular harder to get at than it would have been had they never touched it. The Free Religious Association has no special facilities for dealing with social questions: it is not a college of experts, and it would feel no shame at leaving undone the work that none but experts are competent to do.

Henceforth, social questions, of all sorts, must be treated scientifically, with knowledge; that is, not sentimentally, by feeling and faith. All our hope in this direction, so far as method is concerned, is from social science, in its most mature and comprehensive sense. Religion has its part to perform as an animating, inspiring, cheering, consoling power; but knowledge must supply the method. This is a great question, on which there is much to say; and to raise it at all is perhaps an impertinence in this connection. We do it merely to make more emphatic the declaration which we took up pen to make,—namely this,—that the Free Religious Association is not a social reform society; that that is not its business at all; that it could not attend to it without abandoning its main intention; that it could not attend to it with any hope of doing it well, or better than any other religious associations, who have done it so badly as to make it doubtful whether it ever can be done well. Is this plain? O. B. F.

OUR CRITICS.

Miss Martineau points out, in her History of England, that the pioneers of a reform always move in it differently from the way their friends would have them; and they usually show in the end that they understand their own business best. This was never better illustrated than in the criticisms offered by the more liberal Evangelical journals on the late Free Religious Convention in New York. The selection of the time—just after the Evangelical Alliance—especially disturbs these critics; whereas, to us who are most concerned, the time seems to have been admirably chosen, and the success of the meetings unquestionable. We are consoled with, because our hastily improvised gathering did not surpass or equal in numbers the Alliance of the dozen most powerful Protestant sects in America; whereas we have been honestly rejoicing that, out of our scanty resources, we accomplished what we did. If we had possessed the money and the worldly popularity of the Evangelical Alliance, we should not have been slow to use them. What we wished to show was that, even without these, we could bear our testimony and make our mark by the power of truth alone; and we did it.

Success must be judged according to your point of view. When Mrs. Fanny Kemble first came to America, as a young girl, she could not get over her amazement that Americans should have built a monument to celebrate the battle of Bunker Hill, which she had always heard claimed as an English victory. Where a new force measures itself against an old one, the important circumstance does not lie in the numbers, but in the fact that the new levies have taken the field and have stood fire. The Evangelical Alliance gathered greater numbers in New York, did it? Large as it was, it was probably outnumbered by the Roman Catholic congregations of New York on any ordinary Sunday. But the thing that affords us of the Free Religious Association delight, is that our little, undisciplined force should have ventured to show itself in that city at all.

There is something almost amusingly daring in the phenomenon of a mere handful of men and women, —without money, or wide-spread reputation, or a single foreign celebrity to exhibit, or a single great sect to draw upon,—organizing, at a few weeks' notice, a meeting which should throw down the gauntlet to the vast Evangelical Alliance, which had all the wealth, and all the energies, and all the celebrities of all the great Protestant sects to sustain it. David against Goliath was nothing to it. "The shot heard round the world," when a few farmers at Concord joined battle with the British nation, was hardly a better evidence of pluck. While our half-way friends are condoling with us for being outnumbered, we are exchanging delighted congratulations at having, at last, put an army into the field.

It so happens that I know something of the antecedents of that great meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. Sixteen months before it assembled, I happened to meet at breakfast, in London, a member of Parliament, very prominent in an Evangelical sect. He was, even then, in correspondence with the American Committee of Arrangements, in regard to these meetings, and was full of enthusiasm—not over the spiritual elevation shown by his correspondents, but over the liberality with which they were offering money. There was not another country in the world, he said, where money would be so lavished on a public meeting. He was to procure there certain speakers, whose expenses were to be paid from the day of their departure to their return. It seemed to him that all the wealth of Wall Street must flow into the channels of the Evangelical Alliance! He was right; for a liberal share of it undoubtedly did.

I, for one, have helped to get up too many great conventions in my day not to know that it is very much a matter of machinery. Suppose those eminent saints of the money market, Daniel Drew and Jay Cooke, could have spared us, too, a few thousand dollars, that we, too, might import our foreign lions, —Darwin, let us say, and Huxley, and a few turbaned Brahmins, and unconverted Mohammedans from London,—does any one doubt that we could have filled the two largest halls in New York with simultaneous meetings? Even then, of course, we should have had all the pulpits in America against us, but the pulpits would not have been needed to advertise our gathering. As it was, we had only our own few speakers, a few dollars,—and a fewness of everything but purposes and ideas. They who deride these things, and estimate success only by money and numbers, must have very little recollection of the early history of the Christianity they profess. T. W. H.

BED-TIME STORIES. By Louise Chandler Moulton. With Illustrations by Addie Ledyard. Bostop: Roberts Brothers. 1873.

Mrs. Moulton, who has long been known as one of the most sprightly and graceful correspondents of the New York Tribune, Independent, &c., has made a book of very pretty stories for children. The "morals" of them are unexceptionable, according to accepted standards. But "Coals of Fire," telling the common story of the boy who would not return a blow given by his schoolmate, endured the taunts of cowardice, and by-and-by signalized his bravery in the eyes of the assembled school by rescuing his assailant's sister from drowning at a picnic, is a little too much tinctured with "non-resistance" to suit the character of the "natural human boy," as Wordsworth styles him. Why teach children that self-defence is wrong, when mature life must unlearn the lesson? I confess to a hearty admiration of the boy who, never guilty of bullying or hectoring his playmates, especially the smaller ones, knows how to give a good black eye to the bully that strikes him in the face without provocation; and not all the hackneyed encomiums passed on the "moral hero" who puts his hands in his pockets, and goes home to his mother to tell the story of his Christian forbearance, can wipe out the fact that the rough-and-tumble experience of the boy who, when hit, hits back again, makes a manlier fellow in the end than all the Christian morality of the churches. The instinct of self-defence is a healthy one, pagan though it be; and I am glad that the virile gospel of the public school proves generally stronger than the too feminine gospel of the "Sabbath School." It hurts the real conscience of boyhood to teach that the blow struck strictly in self-defence is a sin to be repented of. Such teaching will not be obeyed in practice, and it is a harmful thing to cause an artificial pang of remorse for not obeying it. The quick verdict of the boys is not wholly wrong, when they set down the bully's unresisting victim as a milk-sop rather than a hero. Life in the "world" is a sterner thing than the submissive morality of Christianity can ever control; and I believe in dealing honestly with our boys in this matter of "non-resistance." F. E. A.

OLDPORT DAYS. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1873.

"Only a literary man!" says some one. How wide of the truth! Through all these pages a tender humanity, a close and loving observation of Nature, a delicate humor full of geniality, a strain of thoughtfulness marking the reflective mind and cultivated heart, abound to give pleasure to the reader who has appreciation for that which is higher than merely literary skill. The moral purpose and strength imparted by long and faithful service in the school of reform make a solid substratum in these essays for the fine images, the striking pictures, the nervous and artistic use of words, which place Higginson in the front rank of American literati. Hawthorne's famous descriptions of New England character and scenes, especially of the Salem Custom-House, are no more graphic than those in "Oldport Wharves." Poe's weird and fascinating fatalism finds its match in "The Haunted Window." Thoreau's exquisite familiarity with Nature is paralleled in "Footpaths" and "In a Wherry." Parker's profound tenderness and human-heartedness are no more winning than the same traits in "A Shadow." But for pathos and depth of moral meaning the "Artist's Creation" stands alone,—though there is not a word of moralizing in it from beginning to end. A purer and finer lesson was never conveyed in a simpler or more telling manner; and childhood never found an advocate more persuasive in the pleading of its rights by the setting forth of its helplessness, and beauty, and ideal significance. When literature becomes thus enlisted in the cause of all the higher humanities, it appears as the most eloquent preacher of the coming religion, and shows how little mankind will depend in the future upon the "instituted religion" of the past. F. E. A.

THE INTEREST QUESTION.

BOSTON, October 22, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Before proceeding to answer your reply to my letter of October 10, allow me to thank you for the many words in which it is couched, and to ask your acceptance of my apology for allowing my temper to get the better of my courtesy.

I know of none save the communists (and I think Mr. Heberling does not belong to that class) who oppose interest on any other ground than that it is a violation of the cost principle. If I am correct in this, your statement of the "question at issue" agrees with mine in spirit, if not in letter. If I am incorrect, I acknowledge the force of your criticism. As you say no more about Adam Smith, I conclude that you have abandoned him as an authority. [We did not quote him as such, but still consider his statement correct.—Ed.]

5. Having reconsidered my thought, I fail to see that my interpretation of your language was an unfair one. I have often reflected on the proposition which you mention, but could never believe in it. I am anxious to become acquainted with the logic which says that the denial of one's right to own more than he earns, disestablishes his title to what he does earn.

I do oppose the public school system with all my heart. I oppose it as a communistic institution, and communism I utterly disbelieve in. If true republicanism is based on this institution (and I think it is), then true republicanism is destined and ought to die; and I shall be among the first to bid a most cheerful "farewell" to a system which seems to me the worst, because least responsible, of tyrannies (that of the majority), and which is only valuable as an indication of, and a stepping-stone to, better things to come.

2. If my neighbor was in a position where he must make the exchange or die, then the "right of might" would plainly come in. Most business transactions differ from this only in degree, not in kind.

4. I sincerely appreciate the kindness of the spirit which dictated your last paragraph, but I cannot see the necessity of calling attention to my age. Many good people, to my personal knowledge, think the ideas of a young man not worth looking into, and will pay no attention to his arguments, by which alone he should be judged. Hoping that you will point out my wild inferences,

I remain, yours truly,

BENJAMIN R. TUCKER.

[We cannot go here into any further discussion of this subject, but heartily regret the incidental expression referred to, if it caused any annoyance. Our wish was quite the reverse. Not being one of the "good people," we hope our badness will reinstate us in favor, for we never inquire the age of an argument, but rather its weight.—Ed.]

THE VINELAND LIBERAL LEAGUE.

VINELAND, New Jersey, Oct. 23, 1873.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Our League, after a long summer vacation, has resumed its regular meetings, and revived its interest in liberal questions. At first, most of our attention was given to the theory of organization. The endeavor to harmonize so many and such diverse individual opinions, was, with us, a new and untried experiment, and, at times, it seemed a question of almost doubtful expediency to attempt it. Persons who were in full favor of the "Demands of Liberalism" shrunk from making themselves obnoxious to their Orthodox neighbors by openly advocating these Demands, and asserting their intention to work to "secure practical compliance" with them. The principle involved was just, and a recognition of its justice was allowable; but some of our most intelligent liberals hesitated to identify themselves with any movement which threatened to do away with observances cherished by others, or sanctioned by long continuance. When the League began its work, the 1st and 9th (that part of it relating to amendments to the United States Constitution) Demands were the only ones upon which there was anything like full accord. The others, some thought, did not refer to specific violations of our rights, or, if they did, they were too trivial to get excited over, and it would not pay to embody them in our "Articles of Agreement" as a basis of energetic and practical work. There was also serious objection to your positive expression, "We Demand," it afforded no loophole of escape, and made retreat impossible, and this was to some sufficient reason for expressing their desires in milder terms.

Such diversity in the minds of individuals would have proved an effectual bar to any judicious action, and it seemed well to accept for a time any basis of union, and to give the Demands thorough study and exhaustive discussion. They were taken up separately ly in the League; objections were stated, and arguments in their favor strenuously urged, and I think we have every reason to be satisfied with the result. Conservatives were educated to be more liberal and individually courageous; and extreme radicals were brought to a sense of the fitness of careful statements and less impulsive methods. These debates were continued until the busy season for Vinelanders commenced, making effective work impossible, and then the League adjourned until October.

But the healthy and new directions given to liberal thought have been most helpful. We have met again with more matured opinions and under better auspices. I judge so because the League began to act at once upon the Demand for the exclusion of the Bible from public schools. Of all, this Bible question had been the most objectionable. The members seem now to recognize its pertinence, and the necessity of agitating it. They begin to see that the New Jersey school system is saturated with open and covert Orthodoxy, and are anxious to be rid of it; and, here at least, the liberal element is so strong that I think we can agitate the matter successfully.

Yours, with much respect,
E. G. BLAISDELL.

WHAT IS "INFIDELITY"?

SYRACUSE, N. Y., October 6, 1873.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Your indispensable paper failed to reach me last week,—probably lingering with the Rabbi, teaching. Perhaps you will allow me to ask its readers a pertinent question. After having eliminated the last vestige of loveliness from the character of Deity, is it not "infidel" to deify an eminent Jewish reformer, bestowing upon him all divine perfection and beauty, and then to pour unmeasured wrath upon all who sincerely prefer the radical's "God of Science" to their human substitute, who once cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" What is "infidelity"?

Fraternally thine,
W. TWITCHELL.

EUTHANASIA.

Pliny the elder has left his opinion on record that "the best thing God has bestowed on man is the power to take his own life," and such would appear also to have been the matured judgment of Solomon; for we read in Ecclesiastes that "Death is better than life." But it has been reserved for the myriads of believers in Christianity, and a future state of personal beatitude, to develop a degree of sentimentalism, in regard to prolonging our present existence, altogether inconsistent with that theory of the future to which they have given in such an uncompromising adhesion.

It might have been expected that Stoics, as well as Epicureans, the ancient Hebrews, as well as the disciples of the Buddha, should have been less willing to resign the joys and sorrows of this life than sincere and devout Christians, who are supposed to look forward, with fervid faith and earnest enthusiasm, to the indescribable felicity awaiting them after death. But inexorable facts demonstrate conclusively that the clinging to life is stronger among most denominations of the Church of Christ than would have been considered decent or honorable among any other religious sect or community of which history makes mention! Contrast the contempt of death which characterizes alike the stern soul of a Cato and the uncultured mind of an American Indian—the serenity of a Socrates, placidly sipping the hemlock as he discourses to his friends and recalls his obligations to creditors, or the ready obedience of a Japanese condemned to commit hara-kiri, with the unavailing mental agony which attends the preparation for death in many a Christian bosom,—and who shall say the advantage is not with the philosophical pagan or the illiterate savage?

"Death before dishonor" is the desire of all true men; and the nobility of the sentiment must ever attract the admiration of mankind. We all thrill to the story of the English captain who goes down with his sinking ship rather than go into port as the vanquished captive of a French frigate. In such cases, every one realizes the grandeur of refusing to live. But why may a man be permitted to terminate an existence on account of mental disquietude that he is bound to sustain under the most terrible physical pain? Who believes it would be right to prolong life at the expense of becoming a cannibal? Who would hesitate to put a bullet through the heart or brain of mother, wife, sister, or daughter, if by such action they could be saved from horrible torture, and even more fiendish lust, of brutal barbarians or satanic pirates?

Surely, Christians should be willing at least to do unto others as they would have others do unto them. It is scarcely to be expected, however, that the beneficent desire of the advocates of Euthanasia can be made popular or prevalent, until the morbid and superstitious fancies, fostered by the various creeds of Christianity, in relation to personal extinction, are done away with, and their place supplied by more natural and healthy opinions. So long as men shall be made to believe that the very hairs of their heads are carefully registered, so long will it be next to impossible to convince them that any degree of human suffering can be a greater evil to another than death. I say to another, because, not unfrequently, when the question is brought home to themselves, they willingly acquiesce in that view of it inculcated by the few sensible men and philosophical thinkers who are now seeking to establish the theory and practice of Euthanasia. Meantime we may expect society to sanction, as at present, the judicial murder of those strong-limbed producers, who violate laws contrived to entrap but not to prevent the perpetrators of certain crimes; and, in like manner, nation will wage war against nation, until the fair face of Nature blushes again with the blood of brave men slain to gratify the caprice of a conqueror, or the ambition of a demagogue.

ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.
St. Louis, Sept. 21, 1873.

FIFTY QUESTIONS FOR REVIVALISTS.

BY J. S. THOMSON.

1. Revivalism does not exercise such an influence now as it did a few years ago. Is this growing powerlessness of revivalism owing to an increase of knowledge, or to a disbelief in the necessity of religious excitement?

2. Revivalists study and practise their art with as great assiduity as ever, but they seem to be losing the power of frightening people into theologic thralldom. Do not their frequent terrible immoralities create in the public mind a strong prejudice against revivalism?

3. Does a growing disbelief in the horrible dogma of hell, as it is defined in the Orthodox creeds, account for the indifference with which revivalism is now generally treated?

4. Only ignorant boys and girls, and unthinking men and women, are mesmerized by revivalists to prostrate themselves before the God of popular superstition. Is revivalistic salvation provided only for uneducated people—the "babes and sucklings" in Evangelical nurseries?

5. How is it that revivalists cannot reach the educated classes?

6. Is ignorance more acceptable than education to the God of popular theology?

7. The morality of Universalists, Unitarians, and so-called Liberal Christians, is generally of a higher order than the morality of revivalistic sects. Can we account for this by the fact that the Orthodox party lay much greater stress on a belief in the atonement dogma than on purity of life?

8. Why did not Jesus run such revivals as we have seen in this century?

9. Peter is reported to have taken an active part in the Pentecostal revivals; but the New Testament represents him as a coward, a liar, a swearer, an "unlearned and ignorant man," and a hypocrite. Read: Matthew xvi., 35, 56, 58, 69—74; Acts iv., 13; Galatians ii., 11—14. Did Peter possess the requisite qualifications for a revivalist?

10. Paul was educated, but he was not a revivalist, in the sense in which we understand the term; Peter was unlearned, and he seems to have been the founder of the revivalistic school. "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ," says Paul (I. Corinthians xi., 1). Which of these two disciples imitated their Master in the matter of revivalism? Is it orthodox to prefer Peter to Jesus?

11. Why do revivalists represent their God as being more anxious to "save souls" in autumn and winter than in spring and summer?

12. Is it less dangerous to die in an unconverted state during spring and summer?

13. Owing to the wild excitement of revivalistic scenes, many have become insane; and it seems to be impossible to carry on revivals successfully without terrifying many into madness. Why, then, do not revivalists abandon their inhuman profession?

14. Is it not cruel for revivalists publicly and secretly to urge weak-lunged and sickly people to attend "protracted meetings" during inclement nights?

15. Why is it necessary night after night for people to leave their homes and to kneel at the "altar," or to sit on the "anxious bench," before revivalistic conversion can be effected?

16. Paul says, "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace" (I. Corinthians xiv., 33). Does God, in the nineteenth century, approve of the howlings, groanings, shriekings, dancings, writhings, insane gesticulations, and other disgraceful proceedings often witnessed at "protracted meetings"?

17. Is there anything in so-called Paganism more immodest and irrational than revivalistic extravagance?

18. Revivalistic preachers are generally very ignorant. Is clerical ignorance a passport to success in revivalism?

19. It frequently happens that wandering revivalists are great impostors, and that they are very successful in their calling. Are their converts properly initiated into the mysteries of Orthodoxy?

20. Some converts have to go through the process of re-conversion every year. Does the Infallible Spirit do an imperfect work?

21. Would it not be better to devote the time, strength, thought, and money, fanatically and sinfully spent in revivalism, to study, philanthropy, and natural religion?

22. After the revivalistic rage is over, there is generally a "donation" given to the chief mesmerizer. Does he not often work for "filthy lucre" more than for "the Lord's sake"?

23. Do not revivalists act as if they did not believe in their cruel dogmas?

24. Could revivalists eat good dinners, sleep soundly, grow fat, dress well, be jolly, and caress the converted and unconverted belles, if they really believed in the eternal damnation of countless millions?

25. If the Spirit of the Purest pervade revivals, how is it that we can trace so much clerical and lay immorality to them?

26. If there were no revivalists, would not God do right?

27. Revivalists pray, shouting. Is God deaf?

28. Revivalists collect the "seekers" round the "altar" or on the "anxious bench." Is God unable or unwilling to operate in other parts of the building?

29. In rural districts, the revivalist sometimes calls upon the persons he intends to victimize religiously, for the purpose of praying with them. Does he not insult such persons, by assuming that he is "holier than they," and that they cannot or do not commune with the Ever-Near?

30. Revivalists in their prayers give directions to God. Does He need their directions?

31. Revivalists in their prayers seem to strive desperately to show God the necessity of converting his wayward children. Can they enlighten Him on the subject?

32. Revivalists pray God to fulfil his promises. Are they afraid that He will fail to keep his promises?

33. Can revivalists, by praying, change the Unchangeable?

34. Revivalists accuse God of injustice by saying very often in their prayers, "If thou hadst been just in marking our iniquities," etc. Is this not the coarsest blasphemy?

35. Jesus said, "Use not vain repetitions," etc. A revivalistic prayer is full of tautology and repetition. Are revivalists wiser than their Master?

36. Jesus advised his followers to pray in their closets; but vociferous revivalists, like the ancient Pharisees, pray in public, "that they may be seen of men." Do they not pray more to man than to God?

37. Does not the general conduct of revivalists justify us in saying that they assume to be wiser and more desirous of "saving souls" than God is?

38. Would it not be more modest and humane for revivalists to follow an honest calling than to give lessons to God?

39. Could an educated gentleman be a revivalist, without being conscious of degrading himself?

40. To save souls from hell is the avowed object of revivalists; and a disbelief in the hell dogma, the scare-crow dogma of Christianity, would destroy their profession. Is it not blasphemous to assert that God is the author of a religion that would die without hell-terror?

41. Revivalists assert that God is "angry every day" with many of his children, that He will take "vengeance in his wrath," and that He will "smite the wicked into hell in his fury." Are we to understand from these priestly and vulgar assertions that God is subject to violent fits of passion?

42. Here are the outlines of the "Plan of Salvation," according to revivalism: Jesus was a "just man" and a religious teacher; the Jewish priests hated him on account of his anti-Mosaic doctrines; they plotted together to kill him; Judas, his friend and disciple, betrayed him to them for a small sum; the priests had to hire "false witnesses;" Pilate unjustly sentenced him to be crucified; Peter, his disciple, swore he did not know him; the devil was the prime mover; God could discover no other means of saving a few from hell; and we must believe all this, or be tormented forever. Revivalism, then, presents us with a religion that necessitated the crucifixion of a good man; a false Judas; a swearing Peter; an unjust Pilate; "false witnesses;" an omniscient devil; an angry God; an endless hell; Jewish and Roman cruelty; and a belief in the goodness of divine injustice! Is not revivalism the most horrible blasphemy?

43. If revivalism can thrive only in ignorance, assumption, fear, blasphemy, and sometimes immoral conduct, should not the Christian churches excommunicate the hateful thing?

44. It often happens, at the close of union revivals, that the preachers of the different sects quarrel with one another about the denominational distribution of the converts. Will there be quarrels in heaven on the same subject?

45. Some revivalists pray for the destruction of their opponents. Would Jesus approve of such a prayer? Luke ix., 54—56.

46. If a revivalist "love not his brother, whom he has seen, how can he love God, whom he has not seen"? I John iv., 20.

47. Is it not a fact that, during revivalistic furor, many of the "seekers" and new converts become morose, impolite, lazy, malicious?

48. Must a man unnaturalize himself, before he can be religious?

49. Should not parents and guardians protect the young from the immoral tendencies of revivalism?

50. If a "seeker," or a new convert, were to study these questions, what would be the consequences?

THE LATE John Stuart Mill's conjugal attachment was remarkable in one who was considered a passionless and abstracted thinker. He dedicated his essay on "Liberty" to her—"To the beloved and deplorable memory of her who was the inspirer, and, in part, the author of all that is best in my writings—the friend and wife whose exalted sense of truth and right was my strongest incitement, and whose approbation was my chief reward." He met his death in the low-lying wet lands about Avignon, which he knew to be unhealthy, but which he chose for his retreat because they were close to the cemetery where his wife was buried fifteen years ago, and in order that he might spend as much of his time as possible near her tomb. The house, moreover, was densely surrounded by trees, which he would not allow to be touched, lest the nightingales abounding in the neighborhood should quit the spot; the avenue, under the shade of which he composed and studied, was filled with these birds. If social profligacy and prurient details of domestic scandal are deemed deserving of the space they occupy in public journals, let not the splendid contrast offered in the domestic life of one of the ablest and purest men of modern times be passed over in silence.—Woman's Journal.

To Friends of Free Thought.

The able Series of Articles upon THE ORIGIN OF THE UNIVERSE, or Materialism and Supernaturalism, from the pen of "H. W." Harvard. Distracted, and commenced in THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR, will be continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER, a fearless, out-spoken, eight-page Monthly, devoted to Free Thought, the diffusion of Liberal Sentiments, and the discussion of all questions pertaining to the welfare of the Human Race. Published at Paris, Ill., at the low price of 50 cents a year, and absolutely the "cheapest and sprightliest paper of the kind published in America."

It is yet unknown to many and needs aid. Will not those of liberal views give it "a helping hand"?

An article on the subject named will appear in the number for November, and be duly continued. Send for the paper. Address

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

Our Oil Chrome is Entitled

"THE ARTIST COW."

In twelve colors. The picture represents a cart in the field, with palat, eagle, and palette. painting is landscape. He has for a moment left his brush to chat with a pretty girl at the door of the cottage near by. Meanwhile a cow has discovered his picture, and is busily engaged in licking off the paint, while her calf has poked its nose into the artist's tools, and tumbled them all in a heap on the ground. A little black and white bull is seen marching to the scene, attracted, no doubt, by a huge white umbrella, spread and fastened to a stake drove into the ground to keep the sun from the picture-maker while he is at his work. It should be in every farmer's library.

This oil chrome will be mounted and sent, post-paid, by mail, to every subscriber of THE HERALD OF HEALTH who sends us $2 for 1874.

GREATEST PREMIUM YET.

Or, in case our readers wish a Book Premium instead of a Picture, we will give them, when $2 are sent, THE HERALD OF HEALTH and a copy of

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE.

In one volume of 830 pages.

THE BOOK WILL BE SENT BY MAIL POST-PAYD.

It is printed in new type and on good paper; contains a portrait of Shakespeare, a sketch of his life, and a Glossary, together with his Poems, and is the most marvellous instance of cheapness of which we have any knowledge. For $2.50 we will send THE HERALD OF HEALTH and both premiums.

CLIPPING.—We will send "Harpers' Monthly," "Weekly," or "Bazar," and THE HERALD, with premium, for $2.00. The same for the "Daily," "Atlantic," "Scribner's," "Old and New."

We will send "THE HERALD" and "Weekly Tribune" for $3.50; "Agriculturalist" $3.00; "Our Young Folks" $3.50 with premiums.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH contains, says the "Scientific American," more readable articles than any other magazine that comes to our notice.

$2.00 a year with premium free.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.

Which publishes all the news.
Which is honest and independent in all things.
Which instructs and educates its readers at the same time that it gives them the news.
Which reports the best thoughts and opinions of leading men, as well as the actions of others.

Which published the only full and accurate reports of all the new and valuable scientific lectures of the past year, making a complete library at merely nominal cost.
Which gave a complete and adequate account of the transactions of the American Association for the Advancement of Science at its recent annual meeting at Portland, Me., and republished the same in a Tribune Extra Sheet.

Which published, entire, Agassiz's great series of lectures on the Method of Creation, the final conclusive scientific answer to the Darwinian theory.

Which has reported fully and faithfully, during the past year, the lectures of Tyndall on Light; of John Weiss on Shakespeare; of Wendell Phillips on Art; of Prof. Young on Astronomy; Youmans on Science; and of Bret Harte, Parton, and Mark Twain, on lighter subjects.

Which published Beecher's Yale theological lectures in full—eleven practical sermons to young ministers.

Which has the most complete and intelligent foreign correspondence of any paper in the United States.

Which carries on no quarrels with its rivals, and excludes mere personal issues from its columns, devoting the space thus rescued to news and more important matters.

Which recognizes agriculture as the foremost industry of the country, and prints more information of value to the farmers of the country than any other daily paper, if not more than any agricultural paper.

Which admits no impure or immoral advertisements to its columns, nor publishes anything which is not befitting a refined family circle.

Which is always the first, fullest, and most trustworthy in its news, sparing neither money, effort nor exertion to supply its readers complete information of every important event.

Which anticipated every other paper in the country, and the government itself, in the news of Custer's victories over the Sioux on the Yellowstone, and of the safety of the Polar survivors.

Which had the fullest, most graphic and intelligent accounts of the events of the recent great financial crisis.

Which disclosed the crimes and corruptions of the Brooklyn ring in advance of all other papers.

Which was never so prosperous and flourishing as at the present time, and which is erecting the finest newspaper office in the world.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE is published in three editions: Daily at $10 per year; Semi-Weekly at $5; and Weekly at $2 per year. For clubs the following extremely low rates for the Weekly have been adopted:—

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Tribune Extra.

[Quadruple Sheet.]

The complete and unexampled reports in THE DAILY TRIBUNE of the papers, discussions and proceedings of the World's Evangelical Alliance at its recent meeting in New York, averaging twenty columns per day, for nearly two weeks, will soon appear in a Tribune extra. This extra, which will be one of the largest papers ever issued in this country, will contain four full sheets of THE TRIBUNE size, and will form the only connected and authentic history of the entire session of the Alliance, at a price within reach of all. Many of the papers have been revised by their authors since they were presented, and others which were read in part only or not at all, are given by THE TRIBUNE in full. The Tribune extra is thus of historic interest and permanent value,—indispensable to every intelligent student of current history and the events of the religious world. Price by mail 25 cents; ten copies to any clergyman's address for $2.

The Essence of Religion.
GOD THE IMAGE OF MAN.

Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and Only Source of Religion.

Translated from the German of LUDWIG FEUERBACH, by Professor A. Loos.
12mo. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

To see man trembling and exulting at the sight of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to the soul. Feuerbach's Atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His Materialism was designed to prevent man's exalting in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul—yes he did, and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve the integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that was spilled over the edge of the grave, and lost on the other side. This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected, misused, squandered, made him baseless. Frothingham's Horicultural Hall Lecture, Jan. 1873.

Materialism :

ITS ANCIENT HISTORY, ITS RECENT DEVELOPMENT, ITS PRACTICAL BENEFICENCE.

By Dr. L. BUECHNER, author of "Force and Matter," "Man in Nature," &c., &c.
Translated from the author's manuscript by Professor A. Loos. 25 cts.

The Childhood of the World;
A SIMPLE ACCOUNT OF MAN IN EARLY TIMES.

By EDWARD CLODD, F.R.S.

12mo. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

Extract from a letter from Professor Max Müller to the author:—"I read your book with great pleasure. I have no doubt it will do good, and hope you will continue your work. Nothing spoils our temper so much as having to unlearn in youth, manhood, and even old age, so many things which we were taught as children. Your book like yours will prepare a far better soil in the child's mind, and I was delighted to have it read to my children."
E. B. Tylor, F.R.S., in "Nature" says:—"This little volume is a child's book as to shortness, cheapness, and simplicity of style, though the author reasonably hopes that older people will use it as a source of information not popularly accessible elsewhere, as to the life of Primitive Man and its relation to our own."
This book, if the time has come for the public to take to it, will have a certain effect in the world. It is not a mere compilation from the authors mentioned in the preface, but takes its own grounds, and stands by for itself. Mr. Clodd has thought out his philosophy of life, and used his best skill to bring it into the range of a child's view."

A CARD.—We desire to return our thanks to our patrons for the indulgent patience they have shown with our youth and inexperience in the book publishing business. To this inexperience is doubtless owing the fact that our printers failed by one month's time in fulfilling their contract with us. The necessary absence of Mr. Butts for four weeks also retarded our work.

All orders for the works of Underwood, Buchner and Frothingham were filled a week since, together with all orders of a miscellaneous character. "The Essence of Religion," "The Childhood of the World," our Catalogue, and a most excellent criticism by Frederic Harrison, entitled "The Religion of Inhumanity," will be back from the binders before this paper leaves the press. We have in press a paper of great interest on "The Relation of Witchcraft to Religion." We have also in press Dr. L. Buchner's principal works, "Force and Matter" and "Man," which we intend to issue at a price greatly reduced from the English edition, and within the reach of every Liberal. When they are quite ready we will let the public know.

We also return thanks for some small donations of Liberal tracts, etc., to be gratuitously distributed among our patrons, as occasion may offer; we intend to keep any book which a Liberal, as such, may require, constantly on hand.

Respectfully,

Important Scientific Works.

By PROF. J. CLERK MAXWELL.

(Ready To-day.)

A Treatise on Electricity and Magnetism. By J. Clerk Maxwell, M. A., F. R. S., Professor of Experimental Physics in the University of Cambridge. 2 vols., 8vo. With Illustrations. $12.

The Depths of the Sea. An Account of the General Results of the Dredging Cruises of H. M. S. Lightning and Porcupine during the Summers of 1868, '69 and '70. By Prof. Wyvill Thompson, F. R. S. Medium 8vo., with nearly 100 exquisite wood-cuts and 8 colored maps. $9.

"It is impossible to read its fascinating pages without feeling awakened within us a desire to emulate the author in his efforts to obtain a knowledge of life beneath the waters, of which most of us know nothing."—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

"It is splendidly illustrated and popularly written, with much humor, and the treatment, like the subject, is anything but dry; it is a volume altogether worthy the interest and importance of its subject."—Popular Science Monthly.

"The volume, which forms one of the most important contributions of the season to the science of physical geography, is brought out in a style of rare typographical elegance, and is conspicuously illustrated with admirable drawings from Nature. It will fill a choice place in the library, both for the interest of its contents and the beauty of its execution."—N. Y. Tribune.

"Nothing can be more complete than the account of the scientific results of these voyages, which are fully illustrated by wood-cuts of the strange forms of life brought from the dark depths of the ocean, by charts of soundings and elaborate tables of the deep sea temperature. The book is another example of that mingling of literary interest with scientific completeness and value, which is the only true form of what is called the popularization of science."—Daily News (London).

Zoological Mythology. Or, The Legends of Animals. By Angelo de Gubernatis, Professor of Sanscrit and Comparative Literature at Florence. 2 vols., 8vo., cloth, $3.

The Scientific Bases of Faith. By Joseph John Murphy, author of "Habit and Intelligence." 8vo., cloth, $5.

Old-Fashioned Ethics and Common-Sense Metaphysics, with Some of Their Applications. By William Thomson, author of "A Treatise on Labor." 8vo., cloth, $3.50.

New Book by Amedee Guillemin.

The Forces of Nature. A Popular Introduction to the Study of Physical Phenomena. By Amedee Guillemin. Translation from the French by Mrs. Norman Lockyer, and edited, with Notes and Additions, by J. Norman Lockyer, F. R. S. Imperial 8vo., with 11 colored plates and 450 wood engravings, cloth, $12.50. [Now ready.]

"This book is a luxurious introduction to the study of the physical sciences. M. Guillemin has found an excellent translator in Mrs. Norman Lockyer, while the editorship of Mr. Norman Lockyer, with his notes and additions, are guarantees not only of scientific accuracy but of the completeness and lateness of the information."—Daily News (London).

Buechner, Dr. L. Man: in the Past, Present, and Future. A Popular Account of the results of recent scientific Research as regards the Origin, Position, and Prospects of the Human Race. Translated by W. S. Dallas, F.L.S. Cloth. 12mo. $3.

CONTENTS: INTRODUCTION.—WHENCE DO WE COME? The Antiquity and Original State of the Human Race, and its development from a barbarous beginning.—WHAT ARE WE?—Present Position of Man in Nature, his developmental history and production from the egg cell.—Origin and Genealogy of the Human Race.—WHERE ARE WE GOING?—Future of Man and of the Human Race.—Government.—Nationalities.—Society.—Capital.—Labor and Laborers.—The Family.—Education.—Woman.—Marriage.—Morals.—Religion.—Philosophy.

APPENDIX.—Scientific Evidence, containing Notes, Explanations, and additions of the text.

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."—Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."—Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions—'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?' are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."—Scotsman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to those which it supports."—Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."—Medical Times and Gazette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and outspoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Buechner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed minutely anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a pithy and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign authors in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."—Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Buechner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with praiseworthy neatness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."—Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against, and delivering judgment after independent investigation."—Public Opinion.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC.

BROCHURE OF AMERICAN ART.

With Illustrations by the best American Artists, Designed and Engraved expressly for this work.

Will be ready Oct. 15th.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC has been gotten up regardless of expense, with the purpose of making it, beyond competition, the most beautiful publication of the kind ever attempted in this country. Unlike other almanacs, it is not filled with second-hand cuts, but is purely original. Every design has been made and engraved by the best artists expressly for this publication.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC is truly national in conception, and will be at once accepted as the standard for taste and accuracy in every section of the United States.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE CALENDARS.

Mr. John S. Davis, a young and rising artist who is beginning to be recognized as the coming draughtsman of America, has contributed liberally to the embellishments of this ALMANAC. His set of twelve calendar borders is admirable, and entirely unique in their way.

THE SCHUYLKILL

is represented by a splendid full-page cut, from a drawing of Thomas Moran, the strongest landscape artist in America.

THE OUTCASTS OF FOKER FLAT.

A TROPICAL SCENE.

One of the most exquisite pictures which it is possible to conceive, is contributed by Mary Nemo, to illustrate lines from Joaquin Miller.

RIP VAN WINKLE.

A disquisition on this popular American legend is illustrated by four designs by Mr. Davis.

EVENING ON THE DELAWARE.

is a most perfect picture, by Thomas Moran. It shows that American pastoral scenery has ample charms for poetical illustration, and needs only to be properly treated to have this fact fully recognized.

THE MELANCHOLY DAYS.

This picture is strong and full of poetic feeling, and is a very fine illustration of Bryant's well-known lines.

OLDEN TIME SOUTHERN LIFE.

Mr. Sheppard, a Virginian artist, gives us a glimpse of the patriarchal phase of American slavery. He has chosen a Christmas scene, when the "servants" present themselves for the usual presents, and good wishes and kindly feeling rule in every breast.

A 'COON HUNT

is a second contribution of Mr. Sheppard's, and one of the most striking in the work.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCHOOLMASTER.

THE ILLUSTRATED COVER.

The cover of THE ALDINE ALMANAC is the richest specimen of the medieval style of illumination ever produced in America.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC will be sent to any address, in roller, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, $6.00 cents.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —.
- Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

AN EVANGELICAL exchange tells us that "the Alliance has come and gone." Yes, but mostly gone.

MR. EMERSON calls books, "these silent wives." Artemus Ward might have pronounced such a remark "slightly sarcastical."

CHARLES BRADLAUGH is writing chatty, newsy, and racy letters from this country to his paper in England—The National Reformer.

SEVEN HUNDRED MILLIONS dollars in greenbacks have been issued by our government, and not one of these is a strictly veracious bit of paper.

MR. BRADLAUGH's "Impeachment of the House of Brunswick" is a most scathing review, in particular, of the character of the four Georges.

MR. F. A. HINCKLEY read a thoughtful essay before the Second Radical Club, last Monday evening, upon "Woman—Her Rights and Duties."

DR. COLLIER's "faith-meetings," held in Freeman Place Chapel every Tuesday afternoon at 8 o'clock, are interesting occasions both to believers and "unbelievers."

EX-PRESIDENT WOOLSEY, of Yale College, concludes that "the Constitution of the United States has properly nothing whatever to do with religion."

THE JAPANESE have a daily paper in Yeddo, published by "The Society for the Dispersion of Darkness." It must be a Free Religious organ, we think.

J. J. MURPHY, in a poem on John Stuart Mill, printed in Every Saturday, calls Mr. Mill "My fellow-Christian"! Well, one cannot prevent people calling one names, if they will.

THE BROOKLYN Eagle, speaks of the Christian Union and the Independent as "semi-religious papers." We are curious to know what is the character of the other "semi" of these papers. Is it semi-moral?

AN ARLE theatrical critic, speaking of Edmund Kean, said: "He was the first actor who discovered that heroes were only men." This discovery is likely to be made by most people who become tolerably familiar with "heroes."

"NEXT TO EXCELLENCE itself is the appreciation of it," says Thackeray. Much of truth is contained in this remark. How often one hears another say a good thing, and thinks that he might have said it, had he been in season!

THE DOINGS of one ambitious and selfish speculator in Wall Street are sufficient to throw thousands of poor men out of employment, and to demoralize the finances of a nation. This will not be so when labor and capital are rightly related.

DR. LYMAN BEECHER's old church, at Litchfield, Ct., says the Golden Age, has been turned into an opera house and dancing hall. Dr. Lyman's son Henry makes his pulpit as lively, and sometimes as grotesque and amusing, as any theatre in the land.

"WHY SHOULD I not rejoice in the Lord?" said a pious farmer, lately, in a Boston prayer-meeting. "He showsers my crops for me, and he blesses and increases my stock." Sure enough! Isn't a man highly satisfied with a bank that pays him good dividends?

DR. RAY PALMER says, in the Independent, that "vastly more of evil lies covered and concealed, than has come to light." Why not more hopefully and cheerfully say that vastly more of good lies covered and concealed, than has ever come to light? This would be also a truer statement.

THE Western Catholic says: "Woman is made to be under the dominion of her husband." Well, St. Paul says the same; and the Christian Church says that the wife must "obey" the husband. Those who are in favor of woman's rights have, necessarily, to oppose the teachings of the Bible and of the Christian Church.

A WRITER in the Independent says: "We wrangle over the reading of the Bible in the public schools, and yet rarely give a thought to the necessity of training our youth to the practical observance of the duties of morality." By all means, let us have morality taught; but let it be a natural morality, not a denominational one.

"I GO ON MY KNEES thirty or forty times a day, and ask God to make me holy," said a man in our hearing, in a religious assembly, a few days ago. This comes pretty near obeying the Apostle's injunction to "pray without ceasing." But, query: can God make a man holy? If so, why didn't he make all of us holy, to begin with? And if he did, are we greater than God that we could have unmade what he made?

THE FRENCH are proposing to have a great Military Museum, which shall "contain every kind of arm ever used in war, from the oldest up to the present time." We wish that "every kind of arm" that ever was used, or ever will be, might be put into that Museum and well locked up, and not one allowed ever to be taken out. If mankind could be persuaded to desist from force altogether, for a time, they would then see how really little need there is of any.

THE EMPEROR of Germany lately toasted (not roasted) the emperor of Austria thus: "The friendly sentiments exchanged at Vienna are a pledge of peace for Europe." Why are they? Why should two men decide whether there shall be peace or war between two peoples? But so it is. Most of the bloody wars of history have grown out of personal quarrels. If those who govern others would only govern themselves, we should need none but individual government.

GERRIT SMITH is opposed to "legislating for temperance," but he would "have government class the dram-seller with high criminals, and punish him accordingly." But how could government do this without "legislating for temperance"? We have no law to prevent people eating too much or working too hard; why should we have one to prevent them drinking excessively? It is not a compulsory morality that we want, but a virtue which comes of intelligence and reason.

REV. DR. BELLOW, in the Liberal Christian, makes this statement: "Christianity is the name for the main historic cement of moral and spiritual influence in this world, which is traced back to Christ as its historic fountain." And is it possible that, before Christ, there was no "historic cement of moral and spiritual influence in this world"? The doctor's language would seem to imply his disbelief in any worth mentioning; but what, then, did hold this world together before Christ came?

THIS WAS the way Anna Dickinson appeared to entranced beholders, when she ascended a peak of the Rocky Mountains. She wore "a plain, closely-fitting corsage, short skirt extending just below the knee, trousers wide at the bottom, a few inches longer, blue stockings with white arrow worked from ankle up, low-quartered shoes like a gentleman's Oxford ties;" and in this dress "Anna made a Government pack-mule feel that life had no further charms, for she rode to the top in the same style as her escort!"

IN THE Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting, in New York, not long ago, one "asked prayer for fourteen young people who were seeking the Savior;" two of them had already found him, but the others were "in great trouble and darkness,"—especially one young man "who said his sins were so great that they could not be forgiven." If these people would seek a savior nearer home, they would not have so much trouble in finding him. The one they seek died nearly two thousand years ago, and we are not surprised that the finding him turns out to be very difficult.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Cost to Christendom of the Foreign Mission System.

AN ADDRESS AT THE CONVENTION OF THE
In Cooper Institute, New York, Oct. 15, 1873.

BY FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Six or eight hundred years ago, all Christendom was hurling itself against the Mohammedans, to rescue from infidel control the Holy Sepulchre, and to extend the empire of the Church in lands utterly hostile to it. These gigantic irruptions of the West into the East, known in history as the Crusades or wars of the Cross against the Crescent, came to disastrous and ignominious failure, after continuing for centuries and exhausting Europe of men and means so completely that general social disorganization and anarchy ensued. Yet great results of a beneficial character followed in the wake of these wild, wasteful, and bloody wars. The feudal system was undermined by them; the burgher or middle class gained immensely in power in consequence of them; the seeds of the great insurrection against the Church of Rome known as the Protestant Reformation were sown by them; in short, the vast influence of Christianity over medieval society was shaken to its foundations by the very means adopted to extend and perpetuate it. The Church began to dig its own grave by seeking to establish a universal and solitary sovereignty over the world.

Within the last two or three hundred years, and especially since the beginning of the present century, the same remarkable phenomenon has been repeating itself. Once more the cry of the Christian crusader resounds in all ears; once more the Christian Church masses her forces against the heathen world, for purposes of conquest and universal dominion. True, she does not wield the sword or spear, as of old; her new weapons are well concealed with the olive branch of peace, and the warfare of "iron and blood" is converted into a cannonade of paper pellets in the shape of tracts, hymn-books, and Bibles. She still pours forth warriors by the thousand and money by the million; but the warriors are missionaries and the money is no longer devoted to supplies and munitions of carnal war. Her aim is still the same—to subdue the nations to the sway of her own Lord, and to set up his kingdom from pole to pole. But her means are more subtle than before, and she seeks now to adapt herself to the times. While throwing herself every year with increasing energy into the work of universal propagandism, she relies now on peaceable persuasion rather than forcible compulsion. She will fall in this new warfare as she failed in the old; but, as indirect benefits that she little dreams of and anathematized when they came proceeded ultimately from her crusading campaigns against the Saracens, so now indirect benefits that she little dreams of and will again anathematize when they come will proceed ultimately from her missionary campaigns against the whole heathen world. The new crusades, like the old, will undoubtedly play their part in promoting the progress of the race; though in ways unsuspected by those most active in them. Foremost and chief among these indirect benefits, I reckon the final emancipation of mankind from the Church herself. Sooner or later all men will perceive that, in attempting to evangelize the whole earth, the Church is undertaking a task that can succeed only by a stupendous miracle, beside which all the other miracles she claims to have been wrought by God in her behalf will be dwarfed into utter insignificance. This I intend to demonstrate before I close. The Church herself must surely, at last, consciously confront the impossibility of ever realizing her own ambition to make her empire coterminous with the globe. But even if she does not, the rest of mankind will; and the fact that she has been commanded by her Lord to accomplish an evident impossibility will exert a tremendous influence in opening men's eyes to the true nature of her claim to teach the only true religion. They will not always accept a religion which imposes impossible tasks upon its votaries.

"But does the Church really aim," it may be asked, "at the object you attribute to her? Does she really aspire and expect to conquer the whole world for Christ, her King?"

I give my answer in the words of Rev. Rufus Anderson, D.D., the venerable Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He says [Foreign Missions: Their Relations and Claims, New York, 1870, pages 307 and 309]:—

"There is no political movement in the world that is commensurate with the missionary movement; none that embraces so many nations, none covering so large a portion of the globe. It is the Christian Church going forth, under its Great Captain, for the subjugation of the world. . . . The spiritual war for the conquest of the world has certainly begun, and in a manner never seen in any former age. There is not yet, indeed, a popular enthusiasm in the churches, but that will come. What we most need, just now, is deep, calm, untiring principle; for the contest upon which we have entered is vast, having for its object the reign of Christ over all the earth."

Similar avowals could be collected by the hundred, and with ease.

"But what," you may inquire, "are the reasons and motives that prompt to an undertaking so enormous as the Christianization of the entire world?"

Again I will give my answer in the words of a veteran missionary, Rev. Henry Martyn Scudder, D.D., as published in the New York Independent less than a year ago. He says:—

"Is the missionary work one of option, or of duty?"

It is important to decide this. If we can create the sense of obligation, the enterprise of missions will be triumphantly fulfilled; for there is nothing under the heaven that Christ's Church will not undertake to do if the duty thereof be made clear.

"Is there a command? 'Go ye, therefore, and teach [literally, 'make disciples of'] all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

"Does this command issue from competent authority? Is it like an unauthorized order from a corporal in an army, which may be revoked by a dozen persons above him? Who gave it? Jesus Christ. We know no higher authority in the universe. He is master; we are his disciples. He is commander-in-chief; we are his soldiers. He is king; we are his subjects. He is creator; we are his creatures. He is redeemer; we are his redeemed ones. The authority cannot be disputed. It is that before which every knee must bow.

"Is the field indicated? The Lord of the enterprise himself has said: 'The field is the world.' The boundaries are so defined that there can be no misapprehension. 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature.' It could not be made plainer. Disciples, baptize and teach every one. As long as a single creature is left out anywhere, the limit is not reached, the field is not filled, the work that Christ planned is not done.

"Are we the persons to whom the command is addressed? There can be no doubt of it, for Christ spake it to his disciples, and then added, 'Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,' which shows that the command is delivered to the entire succession of his disciples, down to the end of time. When the world and the Church become co-extensive, then the world is at an end, and the Church alone shall exist in millennial glory, and we can all have a good time and enjoy ourselves.

"Behold, then, the command issued from headquarters, the field indicated, the campaign planned, and ourselves the parties commanded. Is it not manifest that we are under obligation to prosecute this work?"

It is, then, as the fulfilment of a sacred duty to obey the injunction of her Lord, that the Church in this nineteenth century has gone forth to evangelize the world. The motives are, first, loyalty to her King; secondly, the "love of souls," that is, the love of all men as potential subjects of her King; and, thirdly, that mixed mass of motives,—pride of sect, thirst of power, and so forth,—that always enter into such vast movements as this. These motives are adequate, as all history shows, to incite men to the most herculean tasks. It cannot be said that the Church is blind to the difficulties of her tremendous undertaking, or expects to succeed without Divine, or supernatural, assistance. She knows the facts; and she relies on faith in the supposed pledge of Omnipotence to give her success at last.

"The Annual Reports of our Societies," says Rev. Edward White, in his Theory of Missions [page 73], "do not conceal the fact that at present scarcely anything has been done by modern Christianity for the overthrow of the great Paganisms of the East. There are scattered bands of converts; but China and India, with their 500,000,000 of mankind, are heathen, obstinately heathen, still."

Nevertheless, the Church confidently expects to triumph by superhuman means.

"The certainty of final success," says Rev. John C. Lowrie, D.D., Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions,—"for this the Church relies on the word of God. 'The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.' 'All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord, and shall glorify thy name.' 'Until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; and so all Israel shall be saved.' These are examples of prophetic language concerning the prevalence of the kingdom of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ. With these predictions in view, no Christian can doubt the final issue of the contest now waging in the world between the powers of darkness and of light. . . . The simple story of the Cross, the preaching of Christ and him crucified, is the main characteristic of the work of missions in modern as in ancient times. All Protestant missionaries 'preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks foolishness; but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God.' The success of this apostolic preaching will become more marked in coming ages, until all nations are converted unto God. We know no other means of success," &c., &c. [Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, 1868, page 14.]

This, then, is the object of the great missionary movement of modern times—the conversion of the whole world to Christ and the universal establishment of his kingdom; the reason and motive of it are loyalty to his commands, and the "love of souls," together with such meaner motives as find entrance even into sanctified hearts; the confident anticipation of success is based on the promises of the Bible and faith in the power of God; and the only means contemplated is the common preaching of the Gospel, which, somehow or other, it is believed, will be more efficient in the future than in the past. No reliance whatever is placed on civilization, which is avowedly not one of the objects specially contemplated. This point I would emphasize, inasmuch as the civilizing tendency of missions is usually urged upon unbelievers as a sufficient justification of the vast expense they cause. Dr. Anderson refers deprecatingly to the tendency to rely on civilization instead of the simple Gospel as a converting agency; he says that it has placed modern missionaries at a great disadvantage, as compared with the apostles; he says that it "has tended to confuse our conceptions of the religion we were to propagate;" and he describes the failure of the experiment, long since abandoned by the American Board, of "connecting agriculture and the arts with the missionary agencies." [Foreign Missions, page 94, et seq.]

In short, he says explicitly:—

"Education, schools, the press, and whatever else goes to make up the working system, are held in strict subordination to the planting and building up of effective working churches." [Ibid., page 113.]

The probable reason of this policy is to be found in such facts as that which he quotes [page 323] from Rev. George Bowen, editor of the Bombay Guardian, who said in an article of that paper for March 6, 1869:—

"We were told, the other day, by a gentleman at the head of one of the largest of our mission educational institutions, one where a number of devoted and able missionaries have successively labored, that, during thirty years, there had been from it only two converts, the institution being carried on at an average expense of £1000 a year."

Comment is needless.

Bearing in mind, then, that the single object of the foreign mission system is the conversion of the world to Christ, and the extension of his kingdom over all mankind, it is fair to inquire what progress has been made, what it has cost, what it is likely to cost, to ensure success, and what prospects of success exist. For instance, what has been accomplished by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, by far the largest and most efficient of American missionary societies? I shall in my reply to this question use the latest published Report of the Board, that for the year 1872.

Founded in 1810, the American Board has been in active operation sixty-three years. During the first sixty-two years of its existence, as I find by calculation from the above-mentioned Report, it has received and expended a grand total of $14,183,248.65, or, on the average, $229,084.65 a year. Dr. Anderson reported for the year 1868 a total of 25,538 converts (communicants) connected with all the missions of the Board combined. The Annual Report for 1872 gives only a total of 9,019 converts. The great discrepancy is owing to the fact that the Board has recently relinquished all control of the Sandwich Islands mission, which is henceforth to control itself independently. During the year ending August 31, 1872, a total addition of 919 new converts is reported, and a total income of $428,693.49; while the total income for 1868 was $535,838.04—a falling off of $107,145.15 (attributable to the withdrawal of Presbyterian support on the reunion of the Old and New School branches of that great denomination.) If it were fair to estimate the cost of each new convert by dividing the total income for the year by the total number of new converts, the sum would be $467.56; but for various reasons the average cost of a new convert cannot be so easily estimated. This I shall calculate presently from larger and fuller data. The total number of "laborers connected with the missions," including ordained missionaries, physicians, male and female assistants, native pastors, preachers, catechists, teachers, and helpers of all sorts, is 1,278, or more than one for each new convert gained. The whole number of missions, stations, and out-stations, is 538, and the whole number of mission churches is 173; giving an average of 67 members and 7 "laborers" to each church. The whole number of pupils under training in the mission schools is 17,122; and the whole number of pages printed by the mission presses is 7,947,870. Such is the summary of the Board's operations for 1872, showing a total gain of 919 new converts in return for the total outlay of $428,693.49, but not showing the loss of old converts by death, excommunication, &c., and consequently not showing the permanent increase made to the total number of converts, which increase must be less than 919. As to this latter total, by the way, authorities differ. Dr. Anderson reported 25,538 for the year 1868; the Missionary Herald reported 20,788 for 1870; Dr. Butler reported 23,718 for 1871; the Missionary World, a new Cyclopædia of Missions edited in London, reported 23,718 for 1872; while the Board's own Report for 1872, as I have stated, gives 9,019. It is difficult to reconcile these differences; but Dr. Anderson is probably the best authority on this point, whose apparent disagreement with the Report of 1872 is explained by the emancipation of the Sandwich Islands mission.

To go through in detail the Reports of the various missionary societies would be tiresome and profitless, even if I had had access to them all. But fortunately this is not necessary in order to arrive at some very instructive results. With much labor I have collected data and made calculations which throw no little light on the "Cost to Christendom of the Foreign Mission System."

The American Board (to recur to it once more), being founded in 1810, had been 61 years in operation in 1871. For that year, Professor S. C. Bartlett, following Dr. Wm. Butler, reports the total number of its converts as 23,718. Divided by 61, this gives 388 as the average annual gain in new converts for that period. The average annual income of $220,084 being divided by 388, we arrive at $568 as the average cost of each permanent increase of one convert during the same period. This sum is larger than the $467 which would appear to be the cost if we only considered the total receipts and total number of new converts reported for any one year,—the reason being that converts die, or "backslide," or remove, and that the number of new converts reported for a single year is necessarily greater than the permanent increase of church membership. Hence the sum of $568, obtained by dividing the average annual income for a long term of years by the average permanent gain of each year, is as nearly accurate an estimate of the cost to the American Board of each permanent gain of one convert as can be derived from the data furnished. This sum, I suspect, is much larger than is commonly supposed. It is certainly larger than I was prepared to expect. Yet it is less than half as large as the average cost of each new convert in the permanent increase of membership of all the Protestant missions combined. It is clear that the American Board is more economical or else more efficient than most of its sister societies.

I pass now to consider the general statistics of Christendom on this subject, and ask your indulgence while I explain how I have arrived at some important results; for mere assertions on the subject would very properly be challenged by those interested in the support of the missionary system.

The Encyclopædia Britannica, certainly an authority of no slight weight, gives the total numbers of communicants or converts reported by missionary societies for 1857. Adding these various totals together, I find the sum to be 215,192. Dr. Anderson and Dr. Lowrie report the same sum for 1868 as $251,028. From 1857 to 1868, therefore, there has been a gain of 35,836 converts as the aggregate result of the labors of Protestant Christendom in the missionary field during eleven years, or 3,258 a year. The Encyclopædia also gives, as the total amount of money expended for Protestant missions in 1857, the sum of $600,000; which, at present values, is equivalent to $3,240,000 in our legal currency. For 1868, Dr. Anderson reports the total expenditure for Protestant missions as $5,355,698,—an increase of $2,115,698. That is to say, from 1857 to 1868 the annual receipts for Protestant missions gradually increased from $3,240,000 to $5,355,698,—an average annual increase of $192,336. By the common rules of arithmetical progression, it is easy to calculate approximately the grand total expended for Protestant missions during those eleven years, namely, $47,276,339.

If we now divide this sum total of receipts by 35,836, the sum total of new and permanent conversions made during the same eleven years, we arrive at $1,311, as the average cost of a permanent increase of one church member from 1857 to 1868. In other words, it cost Christendom $1,311 for each one of the 35,836 new converts it gained in foreign missions in that period. It is quite safe to set down that amount as the price paid by Christendom for each and every heathen permanently enrolled in its list of church membership from 1857 to 1868; and there is no reason to suppose that the price is less to-day.

How much money, then, is represented by the entire list of heathen thus far converted by Christendom, as reported in the existing church membership of the missionary societies? This list, according to Dr. Anderson and Dr. Lowrie, amounts in all to 251,028; and the total cost of converting them all, if $1,311 is the cost of converting each, is the enormous sum of $329,097,708.

But this list of membership is a mere drop in the bucket, compared with the vast swarms of heathen still to be evangelized; and not only these, but also all Roman Catholics and all members of the great Greek Church are regarded as needing evangelization by Protestant missionaries. Under the name of "nominally Christian lands," Catholic countries and countries inhabited by Greek Christians are classed with China, India, and so on, as all needing to be converted to the true Gospel of Christ. See, then, what a task Protestant Christendom has set for itself! Reckoning the population of the globe at the current estimate, 1,000,000,000, and conceding that 100,000,000 are Protestants not needing further evangelization (a most extravagant hypothesis, if the preachers are to be trusted from Sunday to Sunday here at home), there remain 900,000,000 of human beings to be converted. At an average cost of $1,311, what will be the total expense of "conquering the world for Christ"? Only the modest sum of $1,179,900,000,000! The world to be saved does not contain enough money to pay for its own salvation; much less does Christendom contain it. Yet, if things remain as they are,—if God forbears to change the laws under which missionaries and missionary societies have thus far been obliged to act,—the kingdom of Christ, so confidently expected to be established, can be established at no less price than the inconceivably vast sum I have named. So far from steadily increasing, the grand total of Protestant missionary receipts throughout the world decreased from 1868 to 1871 by the sum of $122,982. It may well be questioned whether the maximum of growth has not been reached, and whether the sources of supply do not begin to feel the inevitable effect of enlarging knowledge respecting missionary propaganda. Be this as it may, there must be a limit somewhere; and it must lie unspeakably short of the vast amount shown to be required for the evangelization of the world. Unless God works a new and most astounding miracle, it is insanity to dream of converting all mankind at all.

Look, again, at the time that must be required. To convert the 900,000,000 of unevangelized and imperfectly evangelized humanity at the rate of 3,258 a year, which I have shown to be the rate from 1857 to 1868, and which is not likely to be increased until the missionary receipts begin again to be increased, would require a period of 276,212 years; by which time it may be gravely doubted whether any "men" will survive on the earth to be converted,—at least, if the law of evolution continues to operate. Yet, to evangelize the world in 276,212 years, at a cost of $1,179,900,000,000, is the work to be accomplished by Protestant missions, unless God intervenes to hasten the process by some miracle of his omnipotence.

If any are sceptical of my calculations merely because they issue in numbers so enormous, let me cite what Dr. A. C. Osborn states in the Baptist Weekly, as quoted in the Independent of last week (October 9):—

"In The Baptist Weekly, Dr. A. C. Osborn gives

certain statistical items in answer to the question, 'Where does a given sum of money expended for the preaching of the Gospel contribute in fact to the conversion of the largest number of souls?' These statistics are reckoned for the year ending with March, 1873, and are taken from public reports and associational minutes. The results of the investigation are summed up as follows:—

"The cost to the Missionary Union (American Baptist) per convert baptized is $55; the cost to the Long Island Association is $44; to the New York Association, $57; to the Black River Association, $28; an average of $50—nearly eight to one in favor of the Union. The largest Asiatic mission costs $43 per convert baptized; to the largest church in Brooklyn the cost was $1045; to the largest church in New York, $840; to the largest church in the Black River Association, $400; an average of $761—eighteen to one in favor of the Union. The Asiatic Mission that baptized the largest number cost $24 per convert baptized; to the church in Brooklyn that baptized the largest number the cost was $154; to the church in New York, $110; to the church in the Black River Association, $101; an average of $110—nearly five to one in favor of the Union."

"The writer goes on to say, to the credit of the churches whose home work is the most costly, that they are the churches that contribute most largely to the support of the Missionary Union; hence, the work of the Union is in a great degree their work. We need not add that these numbers refer solely to Baptist churches at home and abroad."

Dr. Osborn here makes the cost of a new yearly convert to one church as high as $1,045; and this seems to show that the average cost of each new permanent convert to Christendom is not incredibly large if put at $1,311. All the world is, of course, to be permanently converted, if the kingdom of Christ is to be finally established; this conceded, the rest is a mere matter of arithmetic.

What, then, is the spectacle presented by the foreign mission system of Protestant Christendom? More than 2000 ordained missionaries, or some 10,000 "laborers" of various kinds, supported here and there in scattered groups in the midst of vast heathen communities, attempting to convert them all to Christ, but succeeding at a rate which would require over 276,000 years for the realization of their object; while they have to oppose, not only the heathen priests, but also an army of over 5000 rival missionaries of the Church of Rome, whose hostile activity and success are greater than their own. Moreover, an annual expenditure of over $5,000,000 is required to support this crusading army and provide for the campaign in various ways. The task proposed is hopeless from the start; the object sought is itself a delusion and a mistake; and whatever is poured into this deceptive sieve runs to waste.

But sixteen thousands of men and women, even if devoted to utterly visionary ends, do not seem to be a great loss to Christendom; five millions of money, even if spent for utterly fruitless purposes, do not seem to impoverish its resources. Admitting the folly and blunder of the whole experiment to bring mankind to the feet of Jesus, it would appear at first sight that the cost to Christendom is very slight, after all; and that there is no need of shedding tears or uttering exclamations at this particular proof of human superstition.

Alas, the cost to Christendom is greater than it seems. Even as to the money question, five millions of dollars might do a vast amount of tangible and real good, if wisely expended. The amount is large, if the total outlay of Christendom for charitable objects is taken into the account. What with Bible Societies, and Tract Societies, and Young Men's Christian Associations, and the other countless agencies for Christian propaganda at home and abroad, which are all movements auxiliary to the mission system, the sum total at last attained must be formidable. It should be remembered that only a certain amount of money will ever be available, as surplus above the immediate wants of the community, for investment in philanthropic enterprises; and even a small sum, foolishly appropriated, tends to cripple the wiser humanities. Men will give only about so much; no entreaties will induce them to give indefinitely; and if they give the available amount to objects that are worthless, worthy objects must suffer in proportion. Hence, in the "Cost to Christendom of the Mission System," should be reckoned, not only the positive sinkage of the five millions in a quagmire of superstition, but also the negative loss of the good that might have been accomplished by it if put to better uses.

But, deeply as I regret the loss of so much money to really enlightened charities, I regret far more deeply the loss of the high consecration to duty, the large and uncalculating self-devotion, the pure enthusiasm for an arduous and unselfish service, which prompt the faithful missionary so give up home and friends, and the comforts of civilized life, in order to live a life of hardship and obscure toil among strangers. Many missionaries may go from mixed motives; many, also, I firmly believe, from the very highest and purest. I regret that this fine wine of modern society should be spilled into the sand, when humanity does indeed need all the brain and all the heart of her best and bravest. The enthusiasm of the veritable missionary is one of the noblest exhibitions of human nature; I regret profoundly it should ever be evaporated into nothingness in the propagation of unreal and unenobling doctrines. Here is the real and severest loss to Christendom, after all,—the loss of the high purpose and strong devotion which are squandered on an impossible task, and which humanity can ill spare to the service of delusion. What is wanted is not the drying up of the golden stream that now flows into sandy deserts, but rather its diversion into genuinely irrigating and fertilizing channels,—not the extinction of the missionary spirit, but rather its dedication to freedom, to truth, to the real service of mankind. And I trust that Free Religion will be richly and increasingly blessed with it.

PAUL GOWER.

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XXXV. (Concluded.)

Whatever Miss Lizzie might pretend afterwards—and she told a great many fibs about the affair, always abusing her late admirer—Dick Sabin's visits to Beach Street had little to do with it; though he called pretty frequently, and it soon became evident that it was his own fault if he did not step into Mr. Fox's vacant place. The girl gave him every encouragement, quite forgiving his past misbehavior, and, indeed, exhibiting unusual patience at his persisting in not committing himself; which, in truth, cost him the more violence to his inclinations the more he haunted her company, for he had strong passions, and was, as we have seen, rather too sensitive to Miss Livingston's attractions. His opinion of her, however, had not altered in the least; he still thought her both a flirt and a vixen, and, apart from his abnormal Bohemian objections to matrimony, would have scouted the idea of making her his wife, while he was by no means so unscrupulous a libertine as to coolly contemplate other possibilities. As he had told Paul Gower, "he wanted to keep out of mischief and to avoid doing any"—though it might be too curious an inquiry to ask how far his conduct was influenced by a mere sense of expediency. As Dick said, he had had his experiences. But why did he not, at once, shun her presence and danger?—why does the moth hover round the candle? The girl was pretty, and had almost persuaded herself that she was in love with the handsome Englishman, whose assumed nonchalance of course rendered her ten times more desirous of his liking and subjugation. And very soon Dick began to find out that trying to effect a compromise between duty and inclination was like to prove a difficult experiment.

Of course she imposed on herself more completely than she did on Richard; we are, happily, so constituted as generally to be on good terms with ourselves; and self-deception is almost an indispensable preliminary to victimizing others. Some of her attempts exhibited both shrewdness and daring. She recognized his position and charged it in front, not having patience or skill enough to construct masked batteries. I shall oblige the reader with a specimen of her tactics.

"What did you keep away for?" she asked, one summer evening, as they lingered together on the sloop, or doorstep—a custom derived, like the word, from the Knickerbockers, and very prevalent among modern New Yorkers—after the heat of the day. It was a close, humid night; the parlor windows were wide open, to admit what little air might be stirring; there was the usual amount of chat and flirtation in progress within; and the katydids of St. John's Park were making a continual racket in the trees. Dick had preferred out-of-doors for the sake of his cigar, to which Miss Lizzie was so far from objecting that she had actually lighted it for him, and even taken a whiff or two with her own rosy lips. In fact she could smoke, herself, and did so, occasionally—in private. "What kept you away all that time?" she repeated.

"A burnt child dreads the fire!" he answered, gallantly.

"I guess there's no danger!" and the brown eyes searched his very keenly. "Shall I tell you why? and something about yourself into the bargain?"

"If you please," said Richard, politely.

"Well, then, you wanted to show that you wasn't in love with me, and wasn't going to be. You don't think I'm good enough. I'm too much of a fool, and too much of a flirt, for that."

"My dear Miss Lizzie!"

"Oh, I know! It's no use denying it! We are very polite and pretty-spoken, of course, and quite shocked at hearing it in plain English; but it don't alter facts.

We have a grand opinion of ourself underneath all our secretiveness, and are too proud to throw ourself away on a little ally, like Lizzie Livingston! She does well enough to fool with for a spell, but that's all!"

"I'm too old," said Sabin, rather taken aback by this very plain speaking. "If I were only eighteen, now, instead of—"

"Fiddlestick! As if I cared about boys who are always too much in love with themselves to be in earnest about anybody else. No! it must be a man who wins me!—a great, big, strong fellow, who isn't a fop or a dandy, but a real gentleman, though he does wear old boots and smokes a pipe in the street, like an Irishman. He must be generous, and trust and believe in me above all things—above all the world! And then wouldn't I just love him?" This, as written, reads like a very pretty declaration, but there was a theatricality about all this young lady said or did—even when she was in a passion—which rather impaired its effect. Wherefore Richard found the less difficulty in replying:—

"He will be a very lucky fellow, I'm sure. But—candidly, now—don't you think it might be as well for him to hold his own as long as he could, and never put himself wholly at your mercy? You might tire of him, you know! Look at Mr. Fox."

"Charley Fox, indeed! I never want to hear his name again! Don't mention it, unless you wish to insult me! Dick Sabin!"—and she stamped with her foot and looked desperately melodramatic—"I've always been plagued with fools and puppies until I'm real sick of the whole pack of 'em! Sometimes I think men are all selfish and sensual—that they can't love a woman as she wants to be loved—and then I hate them. When you came it was different—you didn't flatter and compliment, and that was why I liked you, though I could see you thought I was a perfect goose. But don't persist in it, or we shall quarrel!—what a big hand you've got!—but I like big hands in men—it looks as if you could defend a woman, if you cared for her!" And the capricious little creature took it between her own and kissed it, Dick feeling—well, as most young men would feel under the circumstances. Perhaps it was fortunate for his resolution that, just then, Mrs. Livingston and one of the boarders—he of the frills and ruffles—came out of the parlor and joined them at the door, thereby effecting a change of conversation. Such risks were not uncommon; though, to do the young lady justice, she diversified them with episodes of pique and extraneous flirtation—the latter in conjunction with those very admirers of whom she professed to have so bad an opinion. But she had a habit of abusing almost everybody behind their backs—and to everybody—as her humor varied; always with an amount of exaggeration which necessitated the taking nothing for granted but the fact of her own ill-temper. And however seductive she might be, a little reflection, out of the range of the big, brown eyes, invariably confirmed Sabin in the dictates of his colder judgment. He knew he had better keep away altogether, but held on—not careless of, but braving, consequences.

There is very little doubt that the intimacy would have resulted either in a violent quarrel or worse, but for an opportune circumstance which brought it to a conclusion without a catastrophe—for the present. This occurred in the shape of Miss Lizzie's sudden acceptance of an invitation to go South with a lady-friend, who, returning to her Georgian home, was desirous of securing both a companion for herself and a musical-governess for her children. Dissatisfied with her position (she had perpetual squabbles with her mother, and seemed quite incapable of living peaceably with her for three days together—for which, indeed, she was not alone to blame), displeased with Sabin, and perhaps entertaining expectations of making her fortune by a marriage with some wealthy planter—she hinted at each and all of these inducements—the girl eagerly closed with the proposal, and summarily departed; there being at least a score of her admirers present at her embarkation, but neither Dick Sabin nor Paul Gower. It happened during their week's cruise down the bay, before mentioned; and they knew nothing about it till their return, when Miss Lizzie was, in all probability, tossing about off Cape Hatteras.

Richard felt much more disappointment than relief at her going away. He was dull for a week, disposed to be sullen, found the boarding-house in Beach Street intolerable, and introduced Miss Lizzie's face so frequently into his "socials" for the Porcupine as to provoke jocular comment from the editor and contributors. Secretly he hoped that she would get married in Georgia—and stay there.

THE TASK TO BE DONE BY MISSIONS.

[From the New York Independent.]

In a geographical point of view, since the revival of Evangelical missionary effort, certain feeble races and scantily-peopled islands have been wholly brought within the domain of Christendom. The negroes of the West Indian Islands have in large numbers accepted Christian instruction. Madagascar, with its monarch, has outwardly adopted the Christian faith. The Sandwich Islanders and the New Zealanders have embraced the Gospel. The Isles of the South Sea are almost wholly Christianized. In various parts of the heathen world Protestant churches have been established, which enroll several hundred thousand members, with many more attendants; and most of them are vigorous and progressive in their spiritual life. But the continental domains of India, China, and Central Asia, are still altogether unevangelized; and Christian missions have but touched the coasts of the great continent of Africa.

In a moral point of view, still greater obstacles remain to be overcome. Of the 700,000,000 human beings yet unevangelized, by far the greater part belong to the three great antagonistic systems of religion—Mohammedanism, Hinduism, and Buddhism. The first of these alone presents encouraging signs for greater efforts. In Turkey, the Levant, and Persia, a spirit of religious dissatisfaction is visible to an extent unknown before. Here and there, individual inquirers are found who take into consideration the claims and teachings of the Gospel, and, perhaps, secretly place more trust in Christ than in the Prophet. But in India, Mohammedanism abates little, if any, of its bigotry, and among the African tribes it still continues its progress and conquests.

A few years ago, it was thought that Hinduism was tottering to its fall before the power of English education. Those who had enjoyed the light of Christian learning and science were expected to distrust their former faith, and, in many cases, to repudiate it altogether. But now it is found that university graduates publicly take part in its most degrading rites, and ostentatiously enroll themselves as its champions. It holds its followers with a tenacity that seems undiminished, and visits those who forsake it for the Christian faith with most severe persecution. Even in the midst of Christian influences, in the heart of London, we have lately seen how many attendants at their Temple Bar are inflexible Brahmins, and proud of their pagan principles.

Buddhism claims 300,000,000 adherents, among whom the few Christian missions which have been established are apparently lost and of little effect. Its power seems to be waning in Japan; but in Ceylon, where this system has been most successfully assailed, it replies by a vigorous self-defence, in sending out controversial tracts, and in boldly endeavoring to sustain its atheistical philosophy by arguments.

The Church Missionary Society has heretofore been known as the Evangelical body, maintaining principles and advocating measures not shared in or sympathized with by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. But now we are thoroughly glad to see that the latter joins in this proposal, and thus makes recognition before the world of the efficacy of prayer, and of its dependence thereon for success in the world's conversion to Christ.

OLD AND NEW MISSIONARIES.

[From the London Saturday Review.]

Various things have just now been calling special attention to the attempts of Christian missionaries to spread the Christian religion in the heathen and other unbelieving parts of the world. The readers of some of the ecclesiastical papers have been startled by some very hard sayings about modern, at all events about Anglican, missionaries, and the missionaries and their friends have been stirred up to equally vigorous answers. With these things we will not meddle. But, steering in a mean between the accusers, possibly the slanderers, and the defenders of modern missions, we can see the acknowledgment of a truth about which we wish to say something as a matter of history. That is the fact that modern missionaries are not so successful as the missionaries of old time. The same fact stands out proclaimed in the general agreement among all the churches of the Anglican communion to keep a day, not of thanksgiving for success in the missionary work, but rather of humiliation for lack of success. Whatever may be the cause, the fact is certain that whole nations are not now converted to Christianity in the same way that they were at various times from the fourth century to the fourteenth—that is, from the conversion of the Goths to the conversion of the Lithuanians; and, whether the zeal and devotion of modern missionaries be or be not equal to the zeal and devotion of ancient missionaries, we think that it would be a very shallow way of dealing with the fact to seek for it wholly in causes of this kind. It certainly seems at first sight that modern missionaries do not make the same utter self-sacrifice as the missionaries of the days of Columba or of Boniface. But the difference is, we suspect, much more apparent than real. A man who went out into the wilderness then did not give up so much as a man who goes out into the wilderness now. Still there certainly is a difference, which calls for explanation. England is now-a-days thronged with retired colonial bishops. But we do not find that Augustine went back to end his days at Rome, or Boniface to end his days in England. And there is one difference also which we are almost afraid to speak of. Our own early history shows us that a married priest, and even a married bishop, was nothing very wonderful, and certainly no man had need to be ashamed of such a father as the priest Odelarius, the father of the monk Odoer. But somehow we cannot altogether stifle a notion that the conversion of England would hardly have gone on quite so well if Augustine and his companions had been each man accompanied by a wife. The services of the devoted sex played a large part in the conversion of most of the European nations, but they were made use of in another way.

But the difference to our mind is altogether independent of such small causes as these. The circumstances under which men try to convert heathens now are wholly different from the circumstances under which men more successfully tried to convert them then. Christianity, we have said long ago, is the religion of the Roman Empire. Be the cause what it may, that is the fact. Christianity is the religion of those countries which either actually form part of the Roman Empire or else got their civilization as well as their religion from either the Old or the New Rome. Within those limits Christianity is universal. It has assumed various national forms—Roman, Greek, Oriental, and Teutonic—but in one form or another it is universal. In the Asiatic and African provinces of Rome, Christianity has either been utterly swept away or remains the religion only of a down-trodden minority. But this is because those regions were cut off alike from the Empire and from the Church by the conquests of men who represented at once an alien religion and an alien social system. Roman Asia and Roman Africa were as fully Christianized as Roman Europe. If they are not Christian now, it is because they were cut off from the sway of Christ and Caesar by conquerors who did not, like the conquerors of the European provinces, become disciples as well as conquerors. And, if Christianity is thus universal in the lands which have drawn their civilization from Rome—that is, in Europe and European colonies—it has made hardly any progress beyond those limits. In the fourth century, Christianity made the conquest of the Roman world. Its one conquest beyond the strict limits of the Empire was the border land, often the dependent land, of Armenia. On the rival power of Rome, on the vigorous nationality of the regenerate Persian, it made no impression whatever. In later days, we hear wonderful tales of the progress made by Nestorian missionaries in the far lands of Asia. But they have left no such lasting fruits as the conversion of the Roman, and of his disciples—the Teuton and the Slave. Whatever may be the cause, we repeat that Christianity is the religion of the Roman Empire in the widest sense of those words, and that it is the religion of very little besides. The wonder of wonders, the thing which stamps Christianity as divine, is that it became the religion of the Roman Empire. That point gained, the rest was nothing wonderful. The wonder was when the Roman Caesar bowed to the faith of a persecuted minority of his own subjects. It was not wonderful that the disciples of Rome, not the less her disciples for being her conquerors, embraced the faith of her teacher. The wonder was when Christ supplanted the Jupiter of the Capitol—that done, to supplant Woden and Czernobog followed in due time as a matter of course.

The fact is that there is no part of the world in which Christianity sets itself before heathen nations in exactly the same light as that in which it was set before them in the days when Western Christendom received the Teuton, and Eastern Christendom received the Slave, as half conqueror, half disciple. There was nowhere the same great gulf fixed between the teacher and the learner that there is now. Our missionaries go forth into distant lands to grapple with two states of things, each of them very different from one another, but both of them still more different from the state of things in Europe at any time from the fourth century to the fourteenth. They go out to distant lands—the element of distance is no small one—in which they appear either as utter strangers or as the fellow-countrymen of alien rulers. They either come as civilized men to mere savages, with the greatest possible gap in language, color, habits, and tone of thought; or else they come across ancient and firmly established systems of religion and social order, the votaries of which are perfectly able to turn round and dispute on equal terms with those who try to convert them. Not only the Mohammedan—who, as compared with the absolute heathen, might almost pass as an heretical Christian—but the Brahmin, the Buddhist, the votaries of all the religions of civilized Asia, have a great deal to say for themselves. Trying to convert them is not like trying to convert one who looks up to his teacher as a superior; it is more like disputing against Julian or Libanius. In either case, whether the missionary has to deal with the savage or with the civilized heathen, there is as little common ground as there can well be between two human creatures; and, at all events in the case of the civilized heathen, there is absolutely no wish for instruction. There is either no dissatisfaction with the established system, or, if there is dissatisfaction, it is not of a kind which is likely to lead men to the adoption of a foreign religion. In the conversion of the Teutonic and Slavonic nations all the circumstances were different. There was, first of all, a real community of race among all the European nations, a community which was utterly forgotten, but which still may not have been without an unconscious practical working. It may be said that there is the same community of race between Europeans and the Aryan nations of India. But, widely as the Roman and the Goth, the Greek and the Serb, had parted from one another, they had by no means parted asunder so widely as the modern Englishman and the modern Hindu. The Goth and the Serb were young nations, full of life and vigor, but certainly not given to any deep speculations. The modern Hindus are an old nation who have stiffened for ages in an established system, and who have their books and their philosophy just as much as we have. The modern civilized Asiatic feels no need for a teacher; the ancient Teuton or Slave was just in the state of mind to be taught. The converts made in the early ages, say from the fourth to the eighth century, fall under two classes. The first class came to their teachers, while in the second class their teachers went to them. The Teutonic nations which pressed into the Empire, and which bowed down before its greatness and civilization, naturally adopted its religion along with its laws, habits, and military discipline. The whole thing is set forth in the saying of Ataulf, that the Goth might conquer as he would, but that it was only by the law of Rome that the world could be governed. With the Roman law the Roman religion came as part of it. Some tribes, the West-Goths themselves among them, had begun to embrace Christianity even before they entered the Empire. But it was not till they had had dealings with the Empire both in war and in peace, and had learned to look upon Rome as the mistress and teacher of the world. Oddly enough, most of them had Christianity first set before them, not in its Orthodox, but in its Arian form. But a few generations of dwelling on Roman ground brought them over to the received faith of the Empire. The Burgundian in Gaul, the Lombard in Italy, the Goth in Spain, all became Orthodox. The Goth in Italy was cut off too soon to adopt the faith of his subjects; but if Theodoric never gave the world a lesson of Orthodoxy, he gave it the higher lesson of toleration.

In these cases, the learners came to the teachers;

the learners had a creed of their own, but not a creed which had enough hold on them to bear up against the spell of the new state of things in which they found themselves. In the other class of cases, the teachers came to the learners. Foremost among these learners were our own fathers. But of whom did our fathers consent to learn? They did not stoop to learn of the conquered Briton; they did not stoop to learn of the Frankish Bishop who came with the Frankish Queen; but when Rome spoke they hearkened. Our forefathers, in that world of their own from which Caesar had withdrawn his legions, beyond the reach of Roman authority, still felt the spell of Roman influence. Let us not disparage the share of the Scot in the conversion of England; but the Scot only watered where the Roman had planted. Our forefathers listened to teaching which came recommended by the example of the city to which the world still looked up, and they adopted it because they clearly had no tie to the faith of their forefathers beyond that of mere traditional association. They were not at all like the philosophical Brahmin or Buddhist of our own times. But they did not lack either common sense or a spirit of inquiry. The old Theng at York wished to know what became of man after death; his own religion could not tell him—which looks as if Walhalla was not yet known in Northumberland; if the Romans knew, he would like very much to learn. The layman had wandered thus far into speculation; the mind of the priest Coifi was more worldly-wise. Woden and Thunor had done so little for him that he would have nothing more to say to them; he would try the God of the Kentishman, who might, perhaps, do more. This last argument would seem to be a local one; at least, it is whispered that it has been used in the converse form by a Christian successor of Coifi, who is said to have announced his firm belief in a God "who had been very good to him." Men who accepted a new faith so readily as that could have had no very firm trust in the old one. When we contrast the easy conversion of England with the stiff-necked resistance of Scandinavia, some centuries later, we may be tempted to think that the Woden religion had, in the meanwhile, put on much more of form and substance; that it had become much more of a creed than it had been in the days of Æthelbert. Anyhow, the conversion of the English was wonderfully easy. The King first allows the strangers to preach, without committing himself to their teaching. A few converts, doubtless the most genuine of all, are made; the King himself believes, then the nobles, then the mass of the people. We hear not seldom of relapses, commonly when the successor of the first Christian King falls away; but the relapses are only for a season. In a generation or two, it might be thought that Christianity had always been the religion of the land. Heathenism is easily swept away, and all its relics and monuments are defaced. In Northumberland, Coifi, as soon as he has made up his own mind, hastens to break down the temple where he had just before been the priest. So, at the other end of Europe, as soon as the Russian Vladimir has announced his conversion, the people of Kief set to work merrily to drag their wooden god through the mud, and to throw him into the Dnieper. There is an element of fun in all these early conversions, which marks a people in the full vigor of their first youth.

In the next stage we find the Teutonic nations, who were already converted, setting to work to convert their still unbelieving brethren. From the age of Augustine we pass to the age of Boniface. Now these conversions among kindred nations, where Northumberland follows the lead of Kent, or where heathen Germany follows the lead of England, were made under the most favorable of all circumstances. We have seen that even the Roman was not separated from the Teuton or the Slave by the same wide gap which separates the modern European from either the savage or the civilized heathen of our times. Still less was there any such gap between the Frank and the Kentishman, between the Kentishman and the Northumbrian, between the West-Saxon and the Saxon in his old land. The teacher and the disciple could perfectly understand one another; they were all of kindred race, kindred speech, kindred manners and feelings. The Christian had simply the advantage which he got from his Christianity itself, and from the intercourse with the nations of the older civilization for which his Christianity had opened the way. A Teuton of the eighth century, speaking to another Teuton of the eighth century, was quite unlike a modern gentleman in black speaking to a naked savage—in short, from the man of the nineteenth century after Christ speaking to a man of the nineteenth century before Christ. Closely connected with this point is the extraordinary influence which women have in all these conversions. They play a part which it was easy for them to play in those days, but which would be absolutely impossible in these. In Gaul, in Britain, in Poland, we find the same story. The heathen King asks for the daughter of his Christian neighbor in marriage. She consents only on condition that he should embrace Christianity, or at least allow Christianity to be preached in his dominions. The conversion of the King and his people follows in due order as a matter of course. But this could only happen in a state of things where Christians and heathens were on the same level, the Christian having only so much of advantage as his Christianity gave him. We cannot do the same between nations where every social condition is different. We cannot send European princesses, or European women of any class, to play the part of Æthelburh and Dobrowka either in Japan or in Central Africa. There is all the difference in the world between the spread of a faith over a continuous region, inhabited by nations on pretty much the same level in point of culture, and all of whom looked up, with more or less reverence, to one or two common centres, and its spread over scattered lands of every language and social state, and by whom the civilization from which the teacher starts is either unknown or despised.

We will stop with the eighth century, because in its later years a new element comes in with the wars of Charles the Great with the Saxons. The conversion of Saxony, of the Slavonic lands to the east of it, of Scandinavia, and above all of Prussia and Livonia, was largely, though not wholly, wrought by the sword. The precept, "Compel them to come in," was carried out literally, in a manner Mohammedan rather than Christian. But, meanwhile, conversions of the old type were going on in Hungary, Poland, and Russia, and the last conversion of all, that of Lithuania, was brought about by an ingenious adaptation of the old method to the new state of things. The heathen Prince still married the Christian Queen; he adopted her faith and brought his own people after him; but this time, unlike any of the earlier cases, Jagello became King of Hedwig's kingdom, and the patriarch of its most illustrious dynasty.

Our argument does not go towards the despising or undervaluing of modern missionary efforts; it goes quite the other way. We believe that modern missionaries have done really great things, considering the circumstances of the case. It is, indeed, only here and there that they have had anything like the successes of old time; but the wonder is that they should have had any successes at all. We will not stop to argue whether the difference is in any way owing to any fault on the part of modern missionaries. Their personal faults or personal merits form so small a part of the case as to be hardly worth thinking of. The difference lies far deeper. The modern missionary has a task far harder than the task of Augustine or Boniface, and he fares accordingly.

MR. ABBOT ON THE HIGH PRICE OF SOULS.

[The appended amusing little tirade, from the St. Paul Evening Journal of Oct. 18, copies from the New York papers many of their mistakes, and introduces original variations of its own. For instance, we quite admire the adroit substitution of $13.11 for $1,311, as the cost of a conversion,—it so nicely opens the way for the cigar illustration! The credit of this little change of the figures is entirely due to the Journal.—Ed.]

At the "Free Religious Association" meeting in New York, the other day, Mr. F. E. Abbot read a paper on the Foreign Missionary Service.

Mr. Abbot has been "a-fingering," and he finds that it costs $13.11 to convert a soul. Mr. Abbot thinks that is too much. The heathen soul isn't worth any $13.11. It is squandering money to send the Gospel to these Chinese and Japs, at such a fearful cost per head. It is interesting to know what this "Advanced Thinker's" estimate of the human soul is. $13.11 will buy a very fair box of cigars at wholesale. We are permitted to infer that Mr. Abbot would sooner invest $13.11 in a box of Habanas than in a Hindu's salvation.

He finds that during the years 1867 and 1868 the whole number of converts made by foreign missionaries was only 3,258. Why does Mr. Abbot go back to these years? Could he not find more recent reports? Why not take '70 and '71, for instance, when the converts by missionaries of the American Board alone amounted to 2,588, to say nothing of other societies in England and America. But Mr. Abbot complains that at this rate it will take 206,212 years to evangelize the world, and the cost of such evangelization, at $13.11 per soul, would be something appalling.

Poor Mr. Abbot! He will probably not live to see "a nation born in a day." But his philosophy and figures look sorry enough to any one who believes in a brighter future for humanity, or can read human history aright, or discern the signs of the times. Match against his elaborately absurd review of the Missionary Service these two sayings:—

"What shall it profit a man if he gains the whole world and lose his own soul?"

"Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth."

THE ATHENS GEORGIAN tells the following sensational story: "There is a report prevalent on our streets that a man living near Scull's Shoals, about twenty miles below this city, told his wife last Saturday night to awake him up before 'ole God Almighty woke on Sunday,' as he wanted to catch a mess of fish for breakfast. His wife, in accordance with his instructions, called him before day Sunday morning, and he, taking his fishing-tackle, went to the stream, and, finding a tempting hole, took his seat upon a rock. His wife waited anxiously for his arrival, but he not appearing, toward night she summoned some neighbors, and went in quest of the truant. Going to the stream, she found the missing man seated upon a rock, and, upon the party requesting him to get up and accompany them home, he told them that the Almighty had sent a judgment upon him, and he had become a part of the rock and could not move. His friends, thinking that he was only jesting, took hold of him and attempted to move him, when he commenced screaming at the top of his voice, and asked them for God's sake not to attempt to lift him up as it would murder him. He further informed them that he had been informed by an unseen presence that, as a judgment for his profanity and Sabbath-breaking, he would never be severed from his present seat, but would remain fastened to it all his days, and that he would be made to preach his own funeral. They say he talks quite freely, and is visited by immense crowds from this and adjoining counties. Several parties, we learn, from this place and Winterville went to see him Wednesday, but have not yet returned.

SONNET.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

TO LITTRE.

I launched my bark upon a lonely sea,
Though all I loved lay weeping on the shore,
And set my sail for climes unknown to me,
And bade my hopes farewell for evermore.
No chart had marked the unfrequented way,
Where soon the giddy needle ceased to guide;
While lowering clouds, that darkened all the day,
Burst into storm, and rent the surging tide.
Black rocks, that lurked like foes along the night,
Rose menacing, but still I struggled on,
Till lo! afar a friendly beacon light
Shone o'er the waste, and led me to the morn.
A stranger hand had fed a saving fire!
'Twas thine, O Master! may it never tire!

GLIMPSES.

THE ST. LOUIS discussion of the Sunday question has been very ably conducted on the liberal side by the two Unitarian ministers in that city, Rev. John C. Learned and Rev. John Snyder.

WHEN, AT A PUBLIC MEETING in England, some representative of the landlord class began to talk of the "surplus of laborers," Joseph Arch got up and put the annihilating question: "Where is the surplus aristocracy?"

LAST SPRING the Pall Mall Gazette said that the English State, as such, was more worthy of the sincere homage of all Englishmen than any church whatever. Is the English monarchy any more worthy than the American republic?

THOMAS NAST's lecture in Boston on November 8 was made exceedingly interesting by the illustrations he drew on the spot. One seemed to be admitted into the very studio that gave birth to the famous cartoons by which so much was done to overthrow the Tammany Ring. It is wonderful that any artist should acquire such facility and rapidity of execution.

THE LONDON Church Times offends the Independent because the former "clumsily calls it 'a leading Congregational journal.'" We are as much astonished as the Independent that it should be supposed to "lead" anything. It is a readable paper, but represents no definite idea, and simply reflects the prevailing confusion of thought on religious subjects.

THE BROOKLYN Catholic Review speaks of "such irresponsible parties as Mr. Frothingham or Mr. Abbot of THE INDEX." If the Review means only "irresponsible" to its own owner, the Pope, we cheerfully accept our share of the compliment. But if it means "irresponsible" to the laws of good breeding recognized by all gentlemen, we as cheerfully decline to accept a compliment to which the Review establishes its own exclusive and indubitable right.

"SOME HAVE SAID that I began at the wrong end," said Joseph Arch, referring with hard Anglo-Saxon monosyllables to the objections brought against his efforts for the elevation of his fellow-laborers: "I do not know which end they wanted me to begin at; they did not tell me, and I began at the end I thought best." We are tempted to give these pithy words as the fittest reply we can make to those who think we have "begun at the wrong end" in impeaching Christianity. The "wrong end" for the Church is the right end for humanity.

MR. THOMAS SCOTT, the well-known London gentleman who unselfishly devotes a large part of his income to the publication and dissemination of liberal tracts of a high order, and who is so kind as to keep us well supplied with them as fast as published, has just included in the series one of the articles written for THE INDEX of September 4, by Mr. Charles K. Whipple, with the title "Talk Kindly, but Avoid Argument." We are glad that the work of our esteemed contributor, whose arrows never miss of their mark, finds appreciation in England as well as in America.

FROM DR. T. A. BLAND, of Chicago, editor of the Scientific Farmer, we learn that a new radical society was formed in that city on the second of November. The daily papers give reports of Prof. Taylor's sermon, which was a vigorous defence of rationalism. We should be pleased to receive a copy of the constitution of the new society and a list of its officers, with whatever other information throws light upon its character and objects. Every attempt to form a new organization on radical principles has our hearty sympathy, and we hope to hear good things of the present one in Chicago.

AT LEAST a little wholesome truth got uttered at the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance. "But two active organized forces exist, Infidelity and Romanism," said Professor Astié; "Protestantism is dead for all offensive movements." The most powerful organization of what the Professor is pleased to style "Infidelity" is the American Union. The United States Constitution is the most effective "infidel" instrument in existence, as has been discovered by that keen observer of the times, the Christian Statesman. It will be well defended against the machinations of all who would Christianize it.

THE SECRETARY of the Syracuse, N. Y., Radical Club, writing in the Daily Standard, shows how much property is exempted from taxation in that city: namely, $250,000 belonging to the members of the National Guard, averaging $800 apiece; at least $500,000 belonging to the Methodist College; not less than $1,000,000 invested in church property; $1,500 of the salary of every minister and priest; and an immense amount of personal property not reached by the tax assessment regulations. The annual taxes remitted on church property alone foot up some $25,000. How long is such gross inequality and favoritism to continue?

PREJUDICE DIES HARD.—Mr. Henry E. Hayne, the colored Secretary of State of South Carolina, has entered the Medical School of the State University. The Charleston News and Courier, which says it is anxious that the colored people should have every facility for acquiring an education, also says that Mr. Hayne's entrance to the University "marks the beginning of the end of an institution within whose walls some of the purest and ablest men in the State lived during the quiet years of their student life." It doesn't approve of admitting colored students to the State University while there is a University endowed by the State exclusively for their benefit.

Mr. Hayne was well known to me, during the war, as Commissary Sergeant of the First South Carolina Volunteers. He was so white that I myself took him for a white man when he came to enlist; and the various officials with whom he had to deal, outside the regiment, did not suspect him of having negro blood. He never was a slave, and was brought up in South Carolina. Prejudice must die hard, if the mere entrance of such a man into a medical school is so alarming.

IT WILL BE SEEN by a "Communication" in our present issue, from Rev. J. L. Hatch, of California, that the San José Liberal League is doing an excellent work. It has started a petition for the repeal of the Act of Congress of June 17, 1870, published in full in THE INDEX of August 16, by which churches are now exempted from taxation in the District of Columbia. This is a most timely movement, and we rejoice to see that our California friends manifest so much energy in its initiation. We have had printed several hundred blank forms of petition adapted for general circulation, calling for the repeal of the same Act; and a copy will be mailed to any address on receipt of a three cent postage stamp. If the members of all Liberal Leagues and other radical societies will only unite in pushing this movement vigorously, it is possible that the obnoxious Act may be repealed this very winter. Let every earnest radical send for a blank petition, and at once canvass for names; and let all credit be given to the San José League for leading off in this most righteous movement.

IN AN ARTICLE published in the Norfolk County Gazette, Mr. Alfred E. Giles tells some very wholesome truths respecting the Massachusetts prohibition law and the alleged "desecration of the Sabbath" in general. Among other things he says: "The prohibition law debauches public and private virtue; it offers a premium on betrayal of trusts; it gives bribes to informants; wherever its influence extends, its miasma works. It hardens and corrupts the hearts of its administrators. It generates hypocrisy and double-dealing. In the large cities liquor can always be bought. True, the dealer charges a higher price for it, because he has to pay bribes monthly, quarterly, or otherwise, to the constables. In the smaller towns it is not always money or gold watches that the officer receives, but perhaps groceries free, or at a reduced price, or it may be an occasional box of cigars, or a bottle of wine, passed in the evening shades out at the office window, and thence taken by an unseen hand. Their evil deeds are notorious: the same paper that related the doings of 'The Temperance Mass Meeting,' contained in the first column of its third page a paragraph entitled and specifying the 'Disgraceful Conduct of State Constables.' The prohibitory law, like the 'Black Code' of the former Slave States, soils whatever it touches."

IF ANYWHERE there is a taste for exquisite Shakspearian criticisms, we hope that endeavors will be promptly made to induce Mr. John Weiss to deliver his new course of lectures in that favored place. If there is a Young Men's Christian Association there, by all means let it refuse him its hall, and thus secure him crowded houses every night, as was the case last winter in New York city. This new course is upon "Shakspeare's Women," and the related topics: embracing "Shakspeare's Women," "Portia," "Women and Men," "Macbeth and his Wife," "Blonde Women and Lady Macbeth," "Helena," "Ophelia," etc. Last year's course comprised "Cause of Laughter," "Irony and Humor," "Dagberry, Malvolio, Touchstone, Bottom," "Ajax, Porter in Macbeth, Fool in Lear," "Falstaff," "Hamlet." Of these lectures the press spoke in the highest terms,—and the people all said amen! It was our good fortune to hear Mr. Weiss read his "Portia" at the last meeting of the Radical Club at Mrs. Sargent's; and it was a feast twice eaten—once in the hearing, once in the reminiscence. As Mr. Bradlaugh said at the time, it was "a most beautifully melodious paper." Will it not be possible this winter to organize in many places parlor readings of these bewitching essays? They will be a credit to the taste of any town that honors itself by such an enterprise. Boston has her Mrs. Sargent; if other cities cannot discover theirs, we shall conclude that Boston is, after all, the real "hub of the universe!"

JOSEPH ARCH, the head of the "National Agricultural Laborers' Union," of England, was publicly welcomed to Boston on the evening of November 5 by a great meeting in Faneuil Hall. Wendell Phillips presided. Two years ago Mr. Arch was a day-laborer upon a farm, working for two or three shillings a day; now he is the recognized head of a great laborers' army of nearly one hundred thousand men. The "Union" he helped to form at that time has succeeded in raising the farm-laborer's wages about four shillings a week, from twenty-five to thirty-three per cent. more than the former rate; and it has become already a felt power in English politics, as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Bright have publicly declared. The object of Mr. Arch in coming to America was to "speak out the land," as he says, for the purpose of getting information which might be of use in directing emigration to Canada and the United States. When a member of Parliament told him that "they could afford to throw all England into a deer-park," and when he found that ten millions of acres of arable land were actually withheld from cultivation for the sole purpose of pauperizing the luxury of the great, he determined that, if the aristocracy would not give the poor a chance to cultivate these lands, he would draw off every laborer from England and leave the aristocracy "only the dirt to eat." Hence his visit to our shores. Now he can tell his companions where to go to earn and to save, whether they want to work on farms or gardens or railroads. The result of his mission (which he proposes to renew next spring) will probably be to increase emigration to this country greatly, if not to turn English game-preserved into homes for human beings instead of rabbits and deer. Every philanthropic heart must sympathize with such aims. In person Mr. Arch is heavy-built, with heavy but intelligent features indicative of great power of will. His language is well-chosen and vigorous, sometimes very pithy and telling, as when he declared that "the laborer's sweat shall no longer be the ointment to supple the joints of idleness and pride," or when he said that "the freedom of your schools will be the savior of America and the savior of Canada." It was gratifying to see that he recognized ignorance as the worst foe of the working-man. Of course it was to be expected that his h's would get a little mixed, but the substance and style of his address proved him to be a man of great native capacity. If he once or twice showed a little exultation at his present position, as when he said,—"I told them that, rather than lay down the sceptre of power I wield over the working-men of England, I would let my head be first taken from my shoulders,"—it should be remembered that he was referring to attempts to bribe or cajole him from fealty to his cause, and that the idea of a popular movement without more or less of personal autocracy is scarcely comprehensible by those to whom he spoke. Such expressions would arouse more jealousy here than in England. On the whole, the impression left on our mind by hearing Mr. Arch was that of an able and incorruptible man, with great concentration and tenacity of purpose, and with an all-absorbing devotion to the welfare of the class for whom he acts.

WHO HAS THE RIGHT TO MARRY?

Having recently been requested by several couples to render the service of uniting them in marriage, we have taken occasion to inquire into the legal qualifications necessary to empower us to render this service. As the question is of a general nature, affecting many ministers who have had the legal right to marry hitherto, but who may doubt their present possession of it on account of having become radicals in their religious opinions, we think it may be worth while to state in THE INDEX the result of our inquiries. The qualifications referred to vary in the different States, but the following are the qualifications prescribed by the statute law of Massachusetts:—"Marriages may be solemnized by a justice of the peace in the county for which he is appointed, when either of the parties resides in the same county; and throughout the State by any minister of the gospel ordained according to the usage of his denomination, who resides within the State and continues to perform the functions of his office; but all marriages shall be solemnized in the city or town in which the person solemnizing them resides, or in which one or both of the persons to be married reside." [Revised Statutes, 106, §14.]

By these regulations, every minister who is qualified to perform the marriage ceremony must be a "minister of the gospel;" he must have been "ordained according to the usage of" some recognized "denomination;" he must reside "within the State;" and he must continue to "perform the functions of his office" as a "minister of the gospel ordained according to the usage of his denomination."

1. Has any one who no longer considers himself a Christian a right to consider himself a "minister"? There seems to be no reason why all ministers should be Christians. A great many persons to-day believe simply in "natural religion," and not a few of them would decline to profess themselves believers in "Christianity," as that term would undoubtedly be interpreted in the courts. But they have the same desire and the same right as Orthodox church-members to be legally married; and, as things now are, they have the same right to have the marriage service performed by a minister or by a magistrate, as they may elect. Whoever, therefore, is a "minister of natural religion" ought to be as much qualified as a Christian minister to perform this service. The word "minister" means etymologically a "servant," being derived from the Latin munus, a hand; it signified originally one who rendered "manual" assistance of any kind, and thus came to be applied to services of other kinds. There is nothing in the derivation of the word to suggest even a remote allusion to Christianity; and a "minister of natural religion" ought to be as well qualified to marry legally as a "minister of the Christian religion," since all religions ought to be on a footing of equality with respect to legal rights. There appears to be no reason why a non-Christian who devotes his life to the service or ministry of natural religion should not be a "minister" in the eye of the law.

2. Has one who no longer considers himself a Christian a right to consider himself a "minister of the gospel"? That depends on what "the gospel" is. In a loose sense one may speak of the "gospel of truth," or the "gospel of humanity;" but there can be little doubt as to what gospel is intended by the statute. The "Christian gospel" alone was originally intended; and that alone would be allowed by the courts (so we are informed on excellent legal authority) to be "the gospel" required by the statute. As if to limit the broad significance of the word "minister," the words "of the gospel" were added on purpose to restrict the right of performing the marriage service to Christian ministers only. Statute law is thus partial to Christianity, as in so many other instances; but the fact of its partiality does not justify a "minister of natural religion" in professing to be a "minister of the gospel." One wrong does not justify another. The statute ought to be reformed; but meanwhile it deprives all ministers of the legal power to marry except such as are willing to call themselves "ministers of the gospel," that is, the Christian gospel. Such was the legal opinion given in reply to our inquiries; and on this ground we felt bound to decline performing the marriage service, as requested, until we had received the commission of justice of the peace, for which, in compliance with an urgent wish, we immediately applied.

3. Does one who has been formerly "ordained according to the usage of his denomination" lose the right to marry by leaving his own denomination, or by stepping outside of all denominations? The mere change of one denomination for another does not deprive him of this right, if he "continues to perform the functions of his office;" but the stepping outside of all denominations, as we are informed, does deprive him of it. What constitutes a "denomination" is not definitely decided; but it must be a denomination commonly recognized as such. It can hardly be claimed that the believers in natural religion, as distinguished from the Christian religion, are a "denomination;" and consequently the minister of natural religion is doubly disqualified for performing the marriage service, as not being a minister of the gospel, and also as not belonging to any recognized denomination. Thus the law of Massachusetts assumes that every minister who performs this service professes himself not only a Christian, but also a member of some particular Christian denomination or sect.

4. The qualification of "residence" has no special interest in this connection.

5. Does one who was formerly "ordained" as a "minister of the gospel," in strict accordance with the "usage" of some particular "denomination," still retain the right to marry, if he becomes a non-Christian, or leaves all denominations? No. The statute requires that he shall still "continue to perform the functions of his office," that is, as a denominational Christian minister. The right to marry does not inhere in the man, but in the office; and, the office being abandoned or resigned, the right lapses. Although regularly ordained in 1864 as a Unitarian minister by Rev. Dr. J. F. Clarke, Rev. E. E. Hale, Rev. T. J. Mumford, and other eminent Unitarian clergymen, we lost the right to marry thus conferred, when we ceased to be a Unitarian Christian minister without becoming attached to some other denomination. By the simple act of performing the marriage service, every minister in Massachusetts professes himself to be a Christian minister, and a member of some Christian denomination; otherwise he does not "continue to perform the functions" of the office by which he acquired the right to perform it, and without which he has no legal right to perform it at all. If he performs the service without being willing to make this profession in open court, he violates the law and renders himself liable to a heavy penalty. But the question whether he shall make this profession or not is left to his own conscience, if he belongs to a denomination which has no recognized tribunal to decide cases of doubtful membership.

While the above sets forth the legal aspect of this subject, an anomaly exists in the case of Jewish rabbis, who undoubtedly perform the marriage service in this State without possessing the prescribed legal qualifications. Probably no one would be disposed to molest them in the exercise of a function which rightfully, if not legally, belongs to them as much as to Christian ministers. But as a matter of fact they are not qualified to marry their own people; and, in order to prevent possible annoyance to them from malicious persons, the statute ought to be amended. Of what nature this amendment should be, we have now no space to discuss. Suffice it to say that, in our opinion, marriage is purely a civil contract so far as the State has any business to meddle with it; and the only thorough reform would be to forbid ministers to exercise any civil function whatever in consequence merely of their clerical position. In other words, no minister as such should have the right to marry; but all marriages should be put on an entirely civil or secular basis, so far as the law is concerned.

SIGNIS OF SUCCESS.

At the close of the late Convention of the Free Religious Association, our reflections were not altogether cheerful. The meetings fell short of our design, and of our expectation. Not that the attendance was less than we looked for; on the whole it was larger. But the display of power on the part of the Association was not so great as we had anticipated, and was much less than we had a fair title to expect. The mental and moral force of the Association did not come out.

But ever since the first days of private meditation, our spirits have been rising, and we have been surprised at the evidences of success that have been forced upon us. They are not the usual evidences, to be sure,—not the favorite or coveted evidences, most certainly; but evidences they are, quite as convincing.

The first is the enemy's rage. It has been amusing in its intensity. A newspaper friend has sent us clippings from the "Christian" (!) journals; and, as we have read them, our admiration at the ingenuities of wrath has overbalanced every emotion. Now, rage attests feeling as well as affection. Both evince strong passion towards a thing; one the passion of fear, the other the passion of love. People show anger at that which hurts them. The loudness of the cry, the violence of the gesticulation, the fury of the blows and curses, demonstrate the extent of the hurt felt. Vituperation is the compliment of hate, as eulogium is the compliment of love. It is inverted flattery, back-handed praise, the honest, spontaneous tribute of terror. Are the Orthodox papers vociferating at a shadow, lampooning a spectre, going into spasms of contumely over an imaginary danger? If they had said nothing about the Convention, but passed it over in silence, we should have felt indeed our insignificance. But now we feel, perhaps unduly though naturally, elated, having wrung such grim and ghastly merriment from our adversaries. "Oh! it was nothing; it did not hurt at all; it was a mere flea-bite," cries the blubbing boy, betraying his agony at a flagellation by his mock-heroic contempt. Henceforth, we shall spare ourselves the exercise of unnecessary self-depreciation. Our foes have given us an estimate of our power such as we had not dared to cherish.

The second sign of success is the employment against us of bad reasoning. The bad cause resorts to bad arguments. Bad arguments betray the bad cause. The delirations of logic are no less significant than the intemperances of feeling. The examples of this are too numerous in the matter under discussion to be mentioned. We choose one from the last issue of the Christian Register, the organ of Unitarianism in Boston, published but a few doors from THE INDEX—which must beware of the consequences that may ensue from too close a neighborhood! Some may object to our selecting an example from the Register, on the ground that the paper has a hereditary taint of bad logic, a logical "depravity," so to speak, which takes its sins in that kind out of the category of faults due to assignable causes. Its sins of reasoning are sins of nature; and sins of nature cannot be accounted for by proximate occasions. Dr. Francis Parkman once drew a nice distinction between "born fools" and "darned fools,"—the former being irresponsible for their witlessness, while the latter, as the qualifying adjective (a corruption of a less becoming word) denotes, are subjects for reprobation. There is force in the objection, but it is weakened by the circumstance that the example we select was only printed in the paper. The editor merely recognized a congenial spirit. It is given below:—

THE EVANGELICAL AND THE ANTI-EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

"For the first time in religious history, not only representatives of differing Christian sects, but people of all religious names and of no religious name are invited to come together as equal brothers, and confer with one another on the highest interests of mankind."—First Annual Report of Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association (1868).

"A gentleman in attendance asked to answer Mr. Weiss, but the chairman said they hired the hall for the purpose of expressing their views, and not to listen to persons holding different opinions."—Report of Convention of Free Religious Association in New York, Advertiser, Oct. 17, 1873.

Have the spirit and methods of the Evangelical Alliance captured the Free Religious Association?

Religion seems to be about as free and about as sectarian in one body as the other. S. C. B.

The delicious non sequitur of this is one of the most perfect things in controversy. It betrays a lack of ratiocination so profound, so utter, so naïve, of such pure unconsciousness, as to merit the description of "childlike." It evinces that complete disappearance of the logical faculty which denotes the final subsidence of mind. To expose it would be to insult the intelligence of our readers, and at the same time to deprive them of the innocent amusement of discovering the little trick. But we cannot help calling their attention to the ingenious assumption of identity between "inviting people to come together as equal brothers" and offering a platform for controversy,—between "conferring with one another on the highest interests of mankind" and debating theological points,—between freedom in religion, and freedom to fight about religion.

If the Free Religious Association had ever claimed that it offered a free platform,—if it had ever pretended to be a debating society,—if it had ever found fault with the Evangelical Alliance for excluding its members from their meetings,—if it had ever accepted the doctrine that a public hall belonged to others than the people who hired it, or that the hirers were not justified in using it for the purposes they designed when they hired it, there might be some ground for criticism on the chairman's villipended decision; though even then there could be no excuse for such atrocious abuse of reasoning. Nothing short of the sectarian spirit will account for that! O. B. F.

Literary Notices.

WANTED--A LITERARY CRITIC.

We Americans are in the habit of saying--and Lady Pollock's late essay in the Contemporary Review has encouraged the impression--that in some departments of literary art we surpass England. This claim of superiority includes the Essay, for instance; and it is now maintained that we are producing better short stories. The first-rate poets of England, if we give this name to Tennyson and Browning, surpass ours; but after these names are spoken, there are no secondary English names to equal Emerson, Longfellow, Bryant, Holmes, Whittier, and Lowell. But the department where we clearly fall behind England is that of criticism. Good, or at least careful criticism, is now abundant in the mother country; while with us even careful criticism is very rare. Let us hastily consider its few organs.

The North American Review lives on its traditions, and on the solid value of its leading articles. But it is fettered by poverty, and, being unable to pay for good work, must often put up with that of journeymen. It was said of its criticisms, several years ago, that they were "one-part Lowell and nine-parts Sophomore." And now that Lowell is in Europe, the Sophomores have it all their own way.

The Atlantic Monthly has always been very unequal in its criticisms, and especially so of late. Mr. Howells has delicacy of perception and expression; but he has no solidity of convictions or attainments, suffers from the want of thorough early training, and is ignorant of many things which a professed critic ought to know. He is whimsical and extravagant in his praises, and often unnecessarily flippant and discourteous in his attacks--as in his allowing Tyndall to be contemptuously set aside by the Atlantic, as "such a coxcomb," almost on the day of his arrival in Boston. The excessively sharp criticism which Mr. Howells' poems have received is in part, no doubt, a result of these defects of his own methods.

The other monthly magazines attempt little in the way of criticism; although much of Bret Harte's best literary work was done in that way, in the Overland. There are sometimes good critical notices in Scribner, and its more elaborate critical articles (as that of Steadman on Landor) are incomparably superior to the corresponding class in the Atlantic--as, for instance, Gordon's paper on DeForest's Novels. Old and New attempts little by way of criticism, but can always be counted upon for hearty praise of its own editor. Is it not questionable taste, when the current advertisement of Old and New, "conducted by Edward E. Hale," asserts, six lines after, that Mr. Hale is "the best writer of short stories on this continent"--a remark sure to be disputed by the admirers of Bret Harte, Aldrich, and "Saxe Holm," to mention no others?

The Literary World is most commendable for promptness, activity, and independence, but is deficient in intellectual calibre and training. A critic who lavishes praise on the style of Ecce Caelum, and the Fair God, cheapens the value of all his praise or censure; and a literary journal which habitually prints French words without their accents and peculiar notations--as in the last number, "Pate de foie gras," and "Ca va sans dire"--damages itself as irretrievably as a man who eats with his knife at a dinner party. Such things put the Literary World, as yet, far below the Nation; yet this last paper sometimes contains woefully bad writing, and makes serious blunders. It also subordinates its literary tastes to its personal and political hostilities, and so still leaves room for a purely literary journal of a high tone. During the reign of Justin McCarthy, the literary department of the New York Independent came up into just influence. Since his departure, it has grown very unequal, exhibiting some very careful criticisms, but with a preference for theology over science, and for science over literature.

The only daily papers in America that can be said to make a specialty of book-criticism are the New York Tribune and the Springfield Republican; although the Boston Globe, and Transcript, and the New York Evening Post, make occasional efforts in that direction. Mr. Ripley of the Tribune stands by general recognition at the head of his guild; he has ability, training, experience, justice, and discrimination; but of late years he has rested too much on his reputation, and has let his scissors do too much of the work. Mr. Sanborn, of the Republican, is a far younger man, and has such qualifications of knowledge and acumen as may easily put him at the head of American criticism, if he can only render his tone more judicial and less partisan, and give his literary judgments less the air of personal likes or dislikes. But, even as it is, his criticisms (if indeed they are always his) are among the most important elements that go to make up what is perhaps, all things considered, the best paper in the United States.

But we need for literary purposes a better paper than any now existing; and until we have the merits of several of the above-named editors rolled into one, we must still hang out the sign: "Wanted--a Critic."

POLITICS AND MYSTERIES OF LIFE INSURANCE. By Eliza Wright. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1873.

Mr. Wright is so well known in insurance circles that his name is enough to secure for his writings the most respectful attention from the initiated. But to the uninitiated this treatise is a sealed volume, presupposing as it does a more or less intimate knowledge of the subject of life insurance in general. The ordinary reader will contemplate it with somewhat of the reverence excited by the inscription on a Chinese tea-chest. If Mr. Wright or some other equally competent person would publish a simple expository treatment of life insurance, imparting such information as common people need in getting their lives insured, and saving them from being swindled as they too often are by cunning agents, it would be a great service to a large class of persons. STORIES OF INFINITY: Lumen--History of a Comet--In Infinity. By Camille Flammarion. Translated from the French by S. R. Crocker. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 1873.

Such books as this of Flammarion and some of Figuier's, which mix up stray bits of science with grotesque imaginings, are of very little value. They are neither "fish, flesh, nor good red herring." I have found it impossible to wade through the dreary puerilities with which this book abounds, and leave it to those who fancy the diet it affords. F. E. A.

EQUAL TAXATION.

EDITOR INDEX:--

As you will see by the enclosed form of petition--which we have adopted, and are taking measures to have circulated throughout the State--our San José Liberal League "means business." The petition has already received a large number of signatures. Please publish it, and recommend this, or a similar form, for immediate circulation in other States.

You will observe, with pleasure, that a law of exemption formerly in force in this State has been declared unconstitutional by our Supreme Court. It is provided by the Second Section of the "General Revenue Act" of 1857, as amended in 1859, that "all property, of every kind and nature whatever," within the State, shall be subject to taxation, "except the property of the State, the Counties, and Municipal Corporations, and of the United States, of colleges, school-houses, and other buildings, for the purposes of education; public hospitals, asylums, poor-houses, and other charitable institutions for the relief of the indigent and afflicted; churches, chapels, and other buildings of religious worship, together with lots of ground appurtenant thereto; the property of widows, and orphan children, to the amount of $1000; growing crops and mining claims."

Notwithstanding that Article 11 of Section 13 of the State Constitution declares that--"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State;" and--"All property in this State shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law,"--this "Act of Exemption" was passed in 1857, and remained in force until 1867, when it was declared unconstitutional.

The case came before the Supreme Court on an action (McCreey) to recover the sum of $8,164.50, alleged to be due for taxes on certain personal property in San Francisco--appealed from the 15th Judicial District. Counsel for defendant argued that the whole Revenue Act of 1857 was null and void, inasmuch as, in direct violation of Article 11, Section 13, of the State Constitution, as quoted above, it did in one of its sections (No. 2) exempt various private properties.

The decision of the Court was, that that part of the "Revenue Act" which provided for the exemption of private property was, as claimed, unconstitutional, null and void; since it was in direct conflict with Article 11, Section 13; but that such unconstitutionality of a portion of the Act "does not render the whole Revenue Act void."

The case of the defendant, not being claimed as coming within the exceptional part, decision was rendered against him; but the exempting clause, so far as all property not public was included, the Court declared "must be stricken from the Act, and the Act must be read as if that provision had not been inserted."

In its decision, the Court (Rhodes) said: "Section 13, Article 11, of the State Constitution was taken, with certain important modifications, from that of Texas, which says, after the above--'except such property as two-thirds of both houses of the Legislature may think proper to exempt from taxation.'" The Court held that, by the omission of this clause in the Constitutional Convention, "it was not intended that the Legislature should possess the power to exempt property from taxation." Furthermore: "If the power exists in the Legislature to exempt growing crops, mining claims, and other property mentioned, the exemption may be carried still further, until property of one class is made to bear the whole burden of taxation."

The defendant asked a re-hearing. In denying this, the Court (Crocker) reviewed and re-affirmed the decision:--

"If the Legislature can tax one class of property or citizens at a particular rate, and another class at a different rate, or omit to tax one or more classes at all, there is no limit to its discretion in these respects. . . . It may collect the whole revenue of the State from merchandise alone, or from a particular class of merchandise; in short, it may establish a system of taxation that would be utterly ruinous to a certain class, or classes, of citizens, whilst other, or more favored classes, would be partially or wholly exempt."

I have written thus at some length of this decision, Mr. Editor, in the hope that it would serve somewhat to call attention to the matter in other States, and encourage those who see the wrong and evil of unequal taxation to work faithfully and intelligently in their own States for its removal. J. L. HATCH.

SAN JOSE, Cal., Oct. 22, 1873.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:--

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of California, would hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal the first section of the Act approved June 17, 1870, entitled "An Act exempting from taxes certain property in the District of Columbia," &c., and providing that "all churches and school-houses, and all buildings, grounds and property appurtenant thereto, and used in connection therewith, in the District of Columbia, shall be exempt from any and all taxes and assessments, national, municipal, or county." We ask this on two grounds:--

First--This part of said Act we understand to be at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Since the exemption from taxation of churches, parsonages, ecclesiastical houses, and sectarian schools, in the District of Columbia, is precisely equivalent in effect to a direct appropriation by Congress for their support, we conceive this measure to violate what all the expounders of the Constitution declare to have been its manifest intent and design; namely, to sever all religious organizations from any connection with, or dependence upon, the civil government, except for equal and impartial protection. And Second--This part of said Act we conceive to be contrary to equity and justice, inasmuch as its effect is to increase our relative proportion of the National taxes, to the end of relieving altogether from taxation certain churches and church properties in the District of Columbia. The Supreme Court of this State having declared such a law of exemption, formerly existing and in force here, to be unconstitutional, the people of California now pay taxes on their own church property, as well as private and denominational schools, and they fail to see any reason or justice in their being compelled, as they virtually are, by this Act of Congress, to assist in paying the taxes on ecclesiastical and other private property in said District.

For these, which seem to us good and sufficient reasons, we ask you forthwith to repeal this part of said Act.

[Mr. Hatch has our most cordial thanks for the above very valuable communication; and we take this opportunity to solicit similar articles from all who have information on this class of subjects to impart. In our editorial columns will be found our response to Mr. Hatch's suggestion, and we look forward hopefully to its general adoption. All honor to the San José Liberal League!--ED.]

"ANGLO-BENGALEE."

"It was a capital thought, wasn't it?" "What was a capital thought, David?" Mr. Montague inquired. "The Anglo-Bengalee," uttered the secretary.

"The Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life-Insurance Company is rather a capital concern, I hope, David," said Montague.

"Capital indeed!" cried the secretary, with another laugh--"in one sense."

"In the only important one," observed the chairman; "which is number one, David."

"What?" asked the secretary, bursting into another laugh. "What will be the paid-up capital according to the next prospectus?"

"A figure of two, and as many oughts after it as the printer can get into the same line," replied his friend. "Ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha!" cried the secretary, laying his hand, with growing familiarity, upon the chairman's arm. "When I look at you, and think of your property in Bengal being--ha, ha, ha!"

The half-expressed idea seemed no less ludicrous to Tigg than to his friend, for he laughed too, heartily.

"Being," resumed David, "being amenable--your property is Bengal being amenable--to all claims upon the company; what look at you and think of that, you might tickle me into fits by waving the feather of a pen at it."

"It's the devilish fine property," said Tigg Montague, "to be amenable to any claims. The preserve of tigers alone is worth a mint of money, David."

David could only reply, in the intervals of his laughter, "Oh, what a chap you are!"

"A capital idea!" said Tigg, returning to his companion's first remark; "no doubt it was a capital idea. It was my idea."

"No, no. It was my idea," said David, "Hark! let a man have some credit. Didn't I say to you that I'd saved a few pounds?"

"You said! Didn't I say to you," interposed Tigg, "that I had come into a few pounds?"

"Certainly you did," returned David, warmly, "but that's not the idea. Who said, that if we put the money together we could furnish an office, and make a show?"

"And who said," retorted Tigg, "that, providing we did it on a sufficiently large scale, we could furnish an office and make a show, without any money at all? Be rational, and just, and calm, and tell me whose idea was that?"

"Why, there," David was obliged to confess, "you had the advantage of me, I admit. But I don't put myself on a level with you. I only want a little credit in the business."

"All the credit you deserve, on have," said Tigg. "The plain work of the company, David--figures, books, circulars, advertisements, pen, ink, and paper, sealing--was and will be--entirely done by you. You are a first-class traveler. I don't dispute it, done by you. You are a first-class traveler. I don't dispute it. But the ornamental department, David, the inventive and poetical department--"

"Is entirely yours," said his friend. "No question of it. But with such a swell turn-out as this, and all the handsome things you've got about you, and the life you lead, I mean to say it's a precious comfortable department, too."

"Does it gain the purpose? Is it Anglo-Bengalee?" asked Tigg.

"Yes," said David.

After a while, Mr. Jonas Chuzzlewit called at the office to be sure his wife's life for his own advantage. But, as he was so pleasantly inquisitive about the amount of "paid-up capital," Tigg Montague recognized a kindred spirit, and said to him without scruple or ceremony--

"Why don't you take premiums, instead of paying 'em? That's what a man like you should do. Join us."

Jonas stared at him in amazement.

"In that a crowded street," asked Montague, raising his attention to the multitude without.

"Very," said Jonas.

"There are printed calculations," said his companion, "which will tell you pretty nearly how many people will pass up and down that thoroughfare in a day. I can tell you how many of 'em will come in here, merely because they find the office here, knowing no more about it than they do of the Pyramids. Ha, ha! Join us. You shall come in 'cha, ha! Join us."

Jonas looked at him harder and harder.

"I can tell you," said Tigg in his ear, "how many of 'em will buy annuities, effect insurances, bring us their money in a hundred shapes and ways, force it upon us, trust us as if we were the Mint; yet know no more about us than you do of that crossing-sweeper at the corner. Not so much. Ha, ha!"

Jesus gradually broke into a smile.

There are many points of contrast between Mr. Montague's "Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life-Insurance Company" and Dr. Cullis's "Faith Meetings," or "Perfect Trust Meetings," held every Tuesday afternoon, formerly in the upper story of the "Congregational Building,"—now in Freeman Place Chapel; but there are also three points of strong resemblance between them. The features common to both are, 1st, an enormous amount of pretension; 2d, a basis for this pretension which won't bear scrutiny, and into which, therefore, scrutiny is systematically erased and discouraged; 3d, a great influx of people who take the confident pretension as sufficient evidence of its soundness, and the reality of its basis, without thinking it at all necessary to make inquiry or examine evidence.

1. The pretension in Dr. Cullis's meeting is that anything asked of God in faith will be granted, and that the experience of the conductors and correspondents of the meeting fully sustains that pretension.

2. The ground on which that pretension is made (in advance of the asserted experience) seems simple enough, when stated in the Anglo-Bengalee manner, but it is, in reality, quite a complicated affair. Dr. Cullis would say, no doubt, if asked for the ground of his pretension above stated—God will certainly fulfill his promise. No doubt He will. Nobody ever questioned it. But how does Dr. Cullis know that God ever promised the very extraordinary and intensely improbable thing in question?

This is how Dr. Cullis gets at it. Jesus of Nazareth (whom he calls "Christ," and whom he worships as God) is reported to have uttered this promise.

Who reported this? It is so reported by four writers, who, from thirty to sixty years after the death and burial of Jesus, noted down such particulars of his sayings and doings as remembrance and rumor had preserved to that time. Some of them represent him as saying to the disciples around him that he himself would grant, others that God his father would grant, all their requests made in faith. Thus, to authorize the absolute confidence which Dr. Cullis expresses, the following assumptions must be made:—

(a.) That the words of Jesus were correctly reported; though recorded only after an interval of time which tends to make verbal accuracy very questionable.

(b.) That the meaning of Jesus was clearly understood after that lapse of time; though the same witnesses in the same documents admit that in his lifetime they often failed to comprehend his meaning; that he repeatedly charged them with dulness and blindness; and that he felt obliged to omit many things which he desired to say, because it was plain that they would not understand him. The same documents show that this misapprehension of the fundamental idea of Jesus by his most devoted disciples continued after his death.

(c.) That Jesus was the Messiah of Hebrew prophecy; the Christ, or "anointed one," who should be a king in the line of David (Jeremiah xxxiii. 17), and who should not only rule the collected Jewish people as David did (Isaiah ix. 7), but should deliver them from all foreign rulers (Isaiah xlv. 2), and make them supreme over all foreign nations (Isaiah lx. 12; Zechariah ix. 10). As these predictions have not been fulfilled at all, it is absurd as well as false to say that they were fulfilled in Jesus. As no such king has reigned, or even been "anointed," in preparation for reigning, as no such deliverer has come, and as no such supremacy of a Jewish power over all Gentile powers has been effected, this claim fairly parallels the hardness, as well as the unsubstantial character, of the Anglo-Bengalee pretensions.

(d.) That God, the All-wise, could possibly have authorized, or could possibly be expected to fulfill, such a promise; a pledge of supreme wisdom to use supreme power to accomplish the requests of all possible degrees of ignorance and prejudice. The true God, being good as well as wise, is to be trusted expressly because He will not grant requests which are ignorantly, foolishly, and harmfully made.

Dr. Cullis does in fact assume, just as confidently as if they were true, these very things; namely:—

That we have, in the New Testament narratives, the very words of Jesus:

That the obvious signification of the promises about answer to prayer above alluded to, as any reader of common intelligence would receive it, is the real intent and meaning of Jesus:

That those promises, alleged to have been uttered by Jesus to certain persons present with him eighteen hundred years ago, are made also, and just as much, to whoever will accept them now:

And that God promises, and will perform, whatever Jesus promised.

Dr. Cullis, as far as his meetings and his publications throw light on the subject, offers no reason why any one of these things should be believed. He simply reiterates them, with the demand that they shall be believed. With serene assurance, he points to the printed promises in the New Testament, just exactly as Tigg Montague pointed to the printed statement of "paid-up capital." [Let it be noticed here that I am not comparing the composition and intent of the New Testament with those of the Anglo-Bengalee documents. I remark only that in both cases a claim is made utterly unreasonable and improbable, and when evidence is asked for, a printed assumption of the matters in question is offered instead of it.]

As there are sufficient reasons for not admitting any one of Dr. Cullis's assumptions above-mentioned, and as Dr. Cullis systematically ignores these reasons, probably because he cannot answer them, there seems good ground for public notice of these peculiarities of his position.

Among the desires and petitions of fanatics, one of the most common is, "to have more power with God;" as if it were an advantage to have power transferred from one perfectly wise, to be exercised by numerous individuals very far from perfectly wise. Through an extensive advertising of Dr. Cullis's pretensions, many people suppose that he has eminent power with God, and in consequence he receives numerous applications to exercise it for the benefit of individuals and associations. These requests he prints in his paper (such of them, he says, as are "proper for publication"), and reads in the meetings above mentioned, requesting all present to join in the prayer that they may be granted. Here are specimens of them:—

That I may be wholly saved; that a church in Ben-sonia may be enlightened on the subject of the Higher Life; that the ever-blessed Spirit may lead me into all truth; from a young lady, that she may have more faith and courage; from a lady sick two years, that she may be healed of all her diseases, and that the Lord would remove two deformities, and make her strong, and sanctify her wholly; that God will give me wisdom and judgment in certain temporal affairs; for an aged man; destitute of religion, and trusting in strict morality; for a young business man, interested in the Higher Life; for a Christian young man desiring this blessing, but who says he cannot see how a man in active business-life can enjoy it; for one who finds it hard to give up all trying, that she may have faith in the blood; for one about starting on a journey, that she may arrive safely at her destination; for one with spinal affection and nervous prostration, that she may be healed; for a speedy restoration to perfect form of my child; that strength may be given me to walk; for an unconverted family in Roxbury; for a Spanish gentleman, that he may be filled with the Spirit; for a people in Florida, that God will come among them, and stir them up mightily; from a Norwegian pastor in Minnesota, for his countrymen, some three hundred thousand in this country, who are spiritually dead; that God will not let the power of Romanism increase in the land; to be directed in seeking for occupation; to be healed of his infirmity; to be delivered from the tempter's power; to be kept from fear of evil; to be delivered from the power of Satan.

Occasionally, in these meetings, a case is reported of the accomplishment of one of the things previously prayed for. Among such a number and variety of requests, it would be strange indeed if some of the things desired were not accomplished through the ordinary and natural methods. It is rather probable than otherwise that a sick person under medical treatment will find relief or cure; that one setting out on a journey will safely reach the end of it; that he who persistently seeks occupation, or spiritual light, or improvement of any sort, will obtain more or less of the benefit desired. But the success, in any of these cases reported in the meetings, is always referred to special divine interposition in answer to prayer, and no case is ever mentioned in which believing prayer has failed to accomplish its purpose. Whether or not the theory is sound, whether or not even a majority of existing facts support it, no information at variance with the theory is ever to be looked for from that quarter.

3. The sublime audacity exhibited in the assumption of such a theory, and the unflinching assertion that it is fully corroborated by their experience, naturally draws observers and inquirers around the chief preachers of this dispensation. Observers are just what they want, since the imitative propensity of human nature is sure to bring out from the crowd a proportion of believers. Of inquirers they quickly dispose, in the manner used by Mr. Squeers to get rid of troublesome questions. When the famous disciplinarian of Dotheboys Hall was asked by some inquisitive parent a question which it was difficult or undesirable to answer, he would ask of the inquirer—"Sir, are you a philosopher?" If the inquirer disclaimed that eminence, Mr. Squeers would gravely reply—"Then, sir, I fear it will be impossible for me to make it clear to you." Just so, when the question is raised whether the sort and the amount of the evidence above hinted at is sufficient absolutely to assure us that the All-wise has ever promised to place supreme power at the disposal of multitudes of fallible human creatures in all stages of ignorance and prejudice, the professors of "Perfect Trust" serenely answer—"Spiritual things need spiritual discernment. The carnal mind is not to be expected to comprehend them!" That is to say, if you venture to ask the grounds for a belief and practice which, at the first view, seem unreasonable and fanatical, you are told, with as much civility as the case admits of, that your incompetency to understand the subject is a bar to all explanation, and that you are guilty for that incompetency; that your duty is to believe what a certain printed document declares, irrespective of evidence; and that the request for evidence shows in you not only unbelief but "an evil heart of unbelief." The Anglo-Bengalee method is used as unblushingly by the prayer-meeting exhorter as by the prize-candy man. In both cases, the amount and the hardness of the pretension made are sufficient, of themselves, to draw a throng of listeners, ready to become believers.

Credulous people, people of easy belief, who are numerous in every community, will throng, I say, about even the prize-candy man, and the claimant of the great property in Bengal, in spite of the immense probability that they are knaves. So strong is the tendency to believe what is seriously and confidently asserted! When the confident pretension is supported by an appearance of good character and honest intention in him who makes it, the influence, of course, is stronger. But most of all is it effective when the pretender is understood to be "pious." Devoutness, to the multitude, is the most taking form of goodness.

Vast numbers of persons are so constituted or educated, so "born or taught," that they are far more readily impressed and moulded by the claim of spiritual eminence, words of authority from one claiming to speak by divine commission, than by any presentation of rational evidence. And such people easily jump to the conclusion that he who purports to be good is also wise. It does not occur to them that he may honestly err in some of his premises or some of his conclusions; that he may have prejudices and make mistakes. They associate with him something of the infallibility which he claims for his Scripture; and in the spiritual department they admit his dictum as authoritative and final. When, therefore, Dr. Cullis sets up for himself and his associates the claim that they are "God's people," implying that the remaining hundreds of millions of men and women are not God's, these credulous spectators accept his classification as correct; and when he proceeds to offer the exercise of his influence with God to obtain favor for any individuals in the crowd who will accept his statements without evidence, and put themselves under his direction, some are always found to admit the monstrous claim; to admit it, and act upon it, without suspecting either the essential and enormous arrogance of the claim itself, or the false and low estimate which it makes of the character of God.

I close by repeating and emphasizing two points.

1. In attitude, in purposes, in general character, there are marked contrasts between the positions of Dr. Cullis and Tigg Montague.

2. Nevertheless, these personages strongly resemble each other in the specific points above noticed; namely, enormous pretensions without adequate foundation; disingenuous contrivances to avoid exposure of the insufficiency of the foundation; and success in obtaining customers, even on such terms.

A REPLY TO DR. HORSCH'S "QUESTION."

EDITOR INDEX:—

In answer to the question asked through THE INDEX of October 23, 1873, page 425, by Mr. Horsch, please allow me to say: That the right or wrong, in taking interest, would depend in extreme cases on other possible alternatives, which the "circumstances" described by Mr. Horsch neither limit nor define. But if the circumstances were so extreme as to justify stealing, or the acceptance of a share of stolen property, then it would be right to accept the interest or steal. We hope this will be satisfactory to Mr. Horsch.

With the permission of the editor, I will here add that I think Mr. Tucker's position taken in THE INDEX of October 23, in replying to Mr. Abbot, is well taken. And I hope that the apparent approval which Mr. Abbot sees in the reference I made to his argument of the liverymen's hire will vanish when he reads more carefully, and that I only approve a "reasonable" hire. Respectfully,

WM. L. HEBERLING.

"OUTSIDE OR INSIDE."

MY DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

"Outside or inside of Judaism" would have been the question eighteen hundred and seventy-three years ago. To-day, it is "outside or inside of Christianity."

There seem to be just as many Christianities as there are Christians. Those who board in the "half-way-houses" try to make it out that their own is the true Christianity. The consistent Christian must submit to the authority of Christianity. Love was taught before Jesus, and has its broadest development and basis in the true radical mind.

The two most admirable points of the life of Jesus and his Apostles were their consistent opposition to the assumptions and corruptions of the priests and church, and likewise their holding fast to that which they found to be true and good in the church of their birth. But did they not stop to be Jews? Were they "outside or inside" of Judaism? If Mr. "H. B." calls himself a radical, he will be more Christ-like outside than inside the complications, assumptions, and corruptions of the Christian Church. The council of years ago opposed the protestant, or radical, or infidel Jesus and his followers. The Evangelical Alliance of to-day is, by necessity, a council of the same nature. The member who called Mr. Charles Bradlaugh a "liar" would be likely, if he had the power, to be a crucifier.

CARL H. HORSCH.

DOVER, N. H., October 18, 1873.

IT IS ONCE more going the rounds of the press that a beetle is capable of lifting 315 times its own weight, while a man of ordinary muscular power is fully 100 times feebler. Why should man forever be brought into unfavorable comparison with beetles? Has it ever struck anybody how many beetles a man can lift? We are also told for the thousandth time that the flea, "scarcely three hundredths of an inch in height, manages to leap without difficulty over a barrier fully 500 times its own altitude. For a man, six feet is an unusually high leap. Imagine him jumping 3000 feet, or nearly three-fifths of a mile." We shall imagine no such thing. It is well enough for a flea to jump. He never does anything else, except to make a dog's life a burden to him. He never leaves his footprints on the sands of time, or sounds the light guitar. He never hired himself out to turn a derrick in Chicago, or gave us the least assistance during the great fire. He has done nothing but jump 500 times his own altitude ever since he was first created, and will continue to do nothing else until his race becomes extinct. It is inexpressibly painful to us to be continually taunted with the fact that mankind are not fleas, ants, beetles, or something of that sort.—Boston Globe.

THE WONDERFUL NEW INVENTION.

Organ With Top Removed.

THE CABINET PIPE ORGAN,

(only perfect combination of Pipe and Reed Organ) has been placed in the market at cheaper rates, newer styles, and greatly improved actions, and as various manufacturers and dealers of the common reed organ are misrepresenting to the public the liability of the Cabinet Pipe Organ to get out of tune, we hereby guarantee the perfection of the organ, and offer our warrant that they will remain in tune equally with any reed organ, and are not affected by change in the atmosphere.

OPINIONS OF MUSICAL JOCKEYS.

George W. Morgan, the great organist—"An indispensable improvement over all Reed Organs."

J. K. Thomas, organist and composer—"One of the most valuable musical inventions of our time."

J. E. Buckton, organist at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Manchester, England—"In my opinion the best Cabinet Organ in the world."

Albert W. Berg, the distinguished organist and composer—"This remarkable organ I consider something entirely by itself, and something above all competition from anything now known."

Churches, Schools, Musicians, and families should not fail to examine this organ before buying anywhere, as it is a complete revolution in Cabinet Organs.

The Essence of Religion.

GOD THE IMAGE OF MAN.
Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and Only Source of Religion.

Translated from the German of LEWIS FEUER-
 BACH, by Professor A. Loos.
 12mo. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 60 cents.

To see man trembling and exulting at the sight
 of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to the soul.
 Feuerbach's Atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His Materialism was designed to prevent man's exalting in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul—yes, he did,
 and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve the integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that was spilled over the edge of the grave, and lost on the other side.
 This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected, misused, routed, made him heart-sick.—Froth- ingham's Horticultural Hall Lecture, Jan. 1873.

A SIMPLE ACCOUNT OF MAN IN EARLY TIMES.

By EDWARD CLODD, F.R.S.
 12mo. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

Extract from a letter from Professor Max Müller
 to the author:—"I read your book with great pleasure. I have no doubt it will do good, and hope you will continue your work. Nothing spoils our temper so much as having to unlearn in youth, manhood, and even old age, so many things which we were taught as children. A book like yours will prepare a far better soil in
 to read to my children."

E. H. Taylor, F.R.S., in "Nature" says:—"This genial little volume is a child's book as to shortness, cheapness, and simplicity of style, though the author reasonably hopes that older people will use it as a source of information not popularly accessible elsewhere, as to the life of Primitive Man and its relation to our own. . . . This book, if the time has come for the public to take to it, will have a certain effect in the world. It is not a mere compilation from the authors mentioned in the preface, but takes its own grounds, and stands by itself. Mr. Clodd has thought out his philosophy of life, and used his
 view."

CONTENTS: INTRODUCTION.—WHENCE DO WE

 from the egg cell.—Origin and Genealogy

 ING?—Future of Man and of the Human Race.—Government.—Nationalities.—Society.—Capital.—Labor and Laborers.—The Family.—Education.—Woman.—Marriage.
 —Morals.—Religion.—Philosophy.

APPENDIX.—Scientific Evidence, containing Notes, Explanations, and additions of the text.

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."—Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."—Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions—'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?'—are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."—Scotsman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to those which it supports."— Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."—Medical Times and Gas- ette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and out-spoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Buchner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed intuitively anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a pithy and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign scientists in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."—Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Buchner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with preciseness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."
 —Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against,
 and delivering judgment after independent

—A—

BROCHURE OF AMERICAN ART.

With Illustrations by the best American Artists, Designed and Engraved expressly for this work.

Will be ready Oct. 13th.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC has been gotten up regardless of expense, with the purpose of making it, beyond competition, the most beautiful publication of the kind ever attempted in this country. Unlike other almanacs, it is not filled with second-hand cuts, but is purely original. Every design has been made and engraved by the best artists expressly for its illustration.

THE ALDINE ALMANAC is truly national in conception, and will be at once accepted as the standard for taste and accuracy in every section of the United States.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

THE CALENDARS.

Mr. John S. Davis, a young and rising artist who is beginning to be recognized as the coming draughtsman of America, has contributed liberally to the embellishments of this ALMANAC.
 His set of twelve calendar borders is admirable, and entirely unique in their way.

THE SCHUYLKILL.

is represented by a splendid full-page cut, from a drawing of Thomas Moran, the strongest landscape artist in America.

THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT.

A synopsis of Bret Hart's inimitable Western sketch accompanies three illustrations by Mr.
 Davis.

A TROPICAL SCENE.

One of the most exquisite pictures which it is possible to conceive is contributed by Mary Nemo, to illustrate lines from Joaquin Miller.

RIP VAN WINKLE

A disquisition on this popular American legend is illustrated by four designs by Mr. Davis.

EVENING ON THE DELAWARE

is a most perfect picture, by Thomas Moran. It shows that American pastoral scenery has ample charms for poetical illustration, and needs only to be properly treated to have this fact fully recognized.

THE MELANCHOLY DAYS.

This picture is strong and full of poetic feeling, and is a very fine illustration of Bryant's well-known lines.

OLDEN TIME SOUTHERN LIFE

Mr. Sheppard, a Virginian artist, gives us a glimpse of the patriarchal phase of American slavery. He has chosen a Christmas scene, when the "servants" present themselves for the usual presents, and good wishes and kindly feeling rule in every breast.

A 'COON HUNT

is a second contribution of Mr. Sheppard's, and one of the most striking in the work.

THE NEW ENGLAND SCHOOLMASTER.

another of Mr. Davis's designs, represents the old-time Yankee schoolhouse, with the master
 "so kind and so true."

THE ILLUMINATED COVER.

The cover of THE ALDINE ALMANAC is the richest specimen of the medieval style of illumination ever produced in America.
 THE ALDINE ALMANAC will be sent to any address, in paper, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price, 60 cents.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF ———.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in ———.
- Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can get together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE is in favor of limiting the presidential service to one term. The people had the same opinion when he was President.

OUR MASSACHUSETTS Gov. Washburn is called a "moderate prohibitionist" by the Christian Union. What is that? Is it a moderate teetotaler?

THE Golden Age thinks that Charles Bradlaugh may be the first President of the Republic of England. Stranger things than this have happened.

THE NEXT meeting of the Second Radical Club will be on the evening of Monday, Nov. 24, at No. 3 Tremont Place. Mrs. Zena Fay Pierce will read the essay.

MR. EMERSON says, "We live by truth." Jesus says, "Man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word which cometh out of the mouth of God." Both of these men spoke wisdom.

THE English National Agricultural Laborers' Union, of which Joseph Arch is President, has the names of eighty thousand men on its books, and a weekly income of eighty thousand dollars.

REV. DR. MARK HOPKINS, Ex-President of Brown University, says that "we are to test the Sabbath by its relation to human well-being, and to use it for that end." So, also, says common sense.

THERE ARE MORE than ten millions of acres of land lying idle in England, of no use to anybody but for the support of a privileged few; and Mr. Arch and the laboring men of England protest against this monopoly.

THEODORE TILTON has begun a serial story in his paper, entitled "Tempest Tossed." He has proved himself to be a good editor, a good lecturer, and a good campaign orator; it now remains to him to prove that he is a good story-teller.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH highly eulogizes Emilio Castelar of Spain. He says that, if Castelar fails to make a permanent republic of that country, it will not be for the lack of the purest motives and the most distinguished ability in himself.

IN THE Boston Herald, of October 18, appeared this advertisement: "Wanted—Evangelical Christians to stand up for Jesus at the Sunday debates at Hospitaler Hall, 508 Washington St." We trust that, before this, the Young Men's Christian Association have supplied this want.

"THE NATIONAL recognition of Jesus Christ as the Ruler of nations." This is the banner-motto of the Christian Amendment party; and this, we think, were we a Christian, would be ours also. But, as it is, we perceive that this would be a politico-religious Caesarism fatal to our republican and personal liberties.

A FRIEND hands us the following epitaph which, though old, is perhaps quaint and striking enough to be repeated:—

"Here lie I, Martin Eldinbrode;
Ha' mercy on my soul, Lorde Gode,
As I would do were I Lorde Gode,
And thou wert Martin Eldinbrode!"

"THE MAN who works for his country's wealth, for his country's benefit, for his country's prosperity," says Joseph Arch, "is a dignified man, and ought to be honored and respected as such." Not merely because he labors, ought a man to be honored and respected, but because of the high motive and the high object with and for which he labors.

THE Boston Journal, of Nov. 13, says: "Mrs. Caroline H. Dall's review of Dr. Edward H. Clarke's work on 'Sex in Education,' published in the Commonwealth this week, is very able. It is sensible and exhaustive." Mrs. Dall is well known as an "able" writer, and whatever literary work she puts her hand to is quite sure to be "sensible and exhaustive."

THE Irish World remarks: "It happens that the United States has had eighteen Presidents. Taking them in the lump, one may safely challenge all the European monarchies and empires that have existed during the Christian era, to produce among them eighteen rulers who can compare with these in blameless dignity and moral worth." We believe the World is right.

WE LATELY HEARD a request read in a prayer-meeting, from a minister "out of employment," for prayers that the "Lord would send him into some field of service where he might do good work for the Master." If prayer in this case proves efficacious, we would recommend that all unemployed ministers resort to the same method of procuring settlements. Parish committees could then be ignored, and direct application made to "the Lord."

EX-GOVERNOR PALMER, of Illinois, has said a good thing about personal liberty and personal morals, and it is this: "Under our system of municipal government, the authority of the local magistracy, and of the police, is practically absolute, and the helpless and the feeble are often outraged, and thousands are made criminals by being first treated as criminals." The method of compelling people to be good is not so rational, as that of educating them to be good. Let us have the minimum of force and the maximum of enlightenment.

MISS KATE HILLARD, President of the Woman's Club of Brooklyn N. Y., in her lecture on "English Poetry," says that "ballad" and "ballet" are derived from the name of the old sun-god—Baal. "The sun, being round, was supposed to be fitly praised with a sort of rhythmic, evolving motion accompanied by singing." "Minister" and "minstrel" also, she says, are derived from the same root. "Gradually the dancing was omitted, and poetry, from being used to chant the praises of God, became the medium by which the deeds of godlike men were perpetuated."

WE READ in the Liberal Christian that "Christianity is slowly but rapidly changing the religions of the globe into its own likeness." "Slowly but rapidly,"—this must be a misprint. But the absurdity of the misprint is no greater than the unsoundness of the whole affirmation. Christianity is being quite as much influenced and modified by the other world-religions as they are by it. The study of Comparative Religion is showing up the unspherical character of each of the historical religions, while at the same time it is bringing us into a large place outside of all forms of religion—into religion itself.

THE Western Catholic says: "Let the truth be told: the system of public education and enlightenment, which has been so perseveringly imparted to American youth, is the source and cause of all the immorality and all the corruption from which its advocates and disciples are, now that they see the consequences, forced to turn away in horror;" and it thinks that, "to find the proper remedy" for all this, "we must rise to the perfect system of education approved of by the Catholic Church." This explicitness and frankness are admirable. It is plain that the Catholic Church is a mortal enemy to our American system of popular education.

"SUBSTANCE IS ETERNAL," says a materialistic writer. Thank God for that, we say, if our materialistic friend will permit us the expression. When we observe how capricious and changeable is human nature, how transient and evanescent are all external things, and then consider that, though all forms are fleeting, the substance of everything yet is permanent,—our gratitude knows no bounds, but breaks through every metaphysical objection with a hearty thanksgiving to something or somebody. We think that even atheists must find it convenient sometimes to say, Thank God! When an enthusiastic heart suddenly comes upon an inspiring truth, it must say something,—and why not, Thank God?

[For THE INDEX.]

Taxation of Church Property.

AN ESSAY

BY JAMES PARTON,

At the Convention of the Free Religious Association,
NEW YORK, OCTOBER 15, 1873.

In most of the States of the Union, churches, colleges, schools, museums, libraries, hospitals, fire-engine houses, cemeteries; charitable institutions generally, and the lands of agricultural societies, are exempt from taxation. I am opposed to all exemptions. Whatever property the State protects ought, I think, to contribute its proportion to the State's support.

But it is church property with which we are to occupy ourselves at the present time—a kind of property which nowhere in the world contributes aught to the support of the government that protects it. From the drum of the medicine man in the Western wilds, to the magnificent organ and orchestra of Trinity Church—from the praying machine of the Siamese, to Saint Peter's at Rome—ecclesiastical property is exempt from taxation.

America is the land of experiment and audacity. It is right and becoming that here, for the first time, the proposition should be deliberately discussed,—to discontinue this exemption.

And let no one suppose that this measure is advocated here in a spirit of hostility to churches. A large proportion of the virtuous people of Christendom, and certainly a very large proportion of all the persons to whom I have been most warmly attached in the course of my life, have been members or frequenters of churches. I know the importance of the part which churches play in our modern world, and how much solace, admonition, and entertainment, they afford to multitudes of most worthy people in every land.

But you do not strengthen an institution by pauperizing it, and you do not strengthen it by making it a fractional part of a pauper, even to the extent of relieving it of its taxes.

An institution exempt from taxation may be a very good fungus, but it comes short of being a living branch. Taxing ecclesiastical property, so far from being an injury to the church, would be one of those just, wise, and timely measures, which benefit everybody and hurt nobody. It would send the sap circulating through torpid members. It would extinguish some feeble life; but it would strengthen and vivify the fittest, which would survive. And this, I am informed, is the opinion of some of the most influential members of the late Evangelical Alliance.

Consider the state of things now existing in any representative country town of the United States. Let me select one, of ten or fifteen thousand inhabitants, and endeavor to see how a fair taxation of the churches would work in practice.

In this town are seventeen Protestant churches struggling for life. The moral and benevolent activity of the place,—that noblest part of human toil which is dedicated to the general good, or to some object in which others share beside ourselves,—this most precious surplus of human energy, strictly limited as it is in amount, is chiefly expended in keeping the breath of life in these seventeen organizations. For this the ladies sew, contrive, beg, cook, sing, hold fairs, give entertainments, get up Baptist picnics, and Episcopal clam-bakes, drum for the Sunday-school, and move heaven and earth. For this seventeen anxious clergymen toil, scheme, and wear out their souls. For this seventeen sextons pull the awful bell, making the day hideous with horrid clang.

This strain upon the best activity of the place is due to the simple fact that one half of these churches are superfluous. On a certain Sunday, some months ago, a fine day in winter, it was ascertained by actual count, that the whole number of persons attending these churches during the day, including the two services, was twenty-eight hundred. The entire church-going population could be handsomely accommodated in one half of the existing edifices.

Why then do they not unite? It is because none of them can quite succeed in dying. While there is life there is hope. They hold on, and will hold on, as long as it is possible for the annual expenses to be met. The law of the survival of the fittest hungers for the extinction of half of them; but that beneficent law is balked and frustrated by the exemption from taxation. That blessed bankruptcy which Mr. Carlyle so justly extols as Nature's remedy for superfluous and mismanaged activities, hangs over them threatening, but powerless, because they do not have to bear their just share of the public burdens.

Macbeth was rationally alarmed upon observing that Banquo, though his brains were out, would not die. It was a dreadful thing indeed. Nothing is more necessary for the general good than that institutions should perish when they have not life enough to live.

In the midst of these seventeen weak and struggling organizations, there is one which abounds in life, vigor, enterprise, and resolution—the Roman Catholic church—usually the largest and handsomest in the town, and the only one which has a full congregation. Nay, it accommodates several congregations on each Sunday! From six in the morning until eight in the evening, it is always occupied, often crowded, and once crammed.

On that Sunday when twenty-eight hundred persons were counted in the seventeen Protestant churches, in this one Catholic church the number was eighteen hundred.

And of whom are these congregations composed? They are composed chiefly of the only classes in the United States that can spare one-half of their income—domestic servants, and operatives in cotton mills.

And they do spare one-half. As a class, they spend their large surplus in two ways: first, in extending the Catholic Church in America; second, in bringing over to America more Catholics. Hence, the rapid growth of the Catholic Church and Catholic institutions in the United States. In the manufacturing cities of New England they add church to church, edifice to edifice, field to field. To-day a monastery is begun; now, it is a nunnery; next year, a new house for the priest; and, before long, a cathedral begins slowly to rise above the houses of the town. And they know well the virtue of holding land. At the very beginning of a new enterprise, they are apt to go for a large piece of land, with room enough sometimes for centuries of growth.

The seventeen Protestant churches look on, and shake their heads, and growl, and forbode evil in the future; but while they are doing so, the priests keep quietly on converting servant girls' pennies and dollars into well-situated lots and solid masonry.

Already, in some of our cities, the property belonging to the Catholic Church is immense. In Saint Louis it is computed at twenty millions, and in New York, say, within ten miles of the City Hall, I should suppose their property would be valued by just Tax Commissioners at not less than eighty millions.

Far be it from me to blame the Catholics for pushing the interests of their Church with so much enterprise, energy, and tact. Their conduct is just what their belief demands of them. They could not be good Catholics if they did not regard the spread of the Catholic Church as the chief interest of man.

But the question for us to consider—for us who are American citizens first, and EVERYTHING ELSE SECOND—is, whether it is safe and right that they should go on thus absorbing the property of the country.

Look abroad! In Sicily, Italy, Spain, Mexico, Peru—in most Catholic countries—wherever you see an edifice, or group of edifices, that overwhelms the mind with wonder, either for its magnitude or its magnificence, you may be sure that it is ecclesiastical. The people,—man, sacred man, to us the most sacred object in the universe, grovels in huts, and wallows in dirt, in order that the inanimate God whom he adores may dwell in lofty temples and glisten with beautiful gems. It is a sorry sight, 'fore God, a sorry sight! May this portion of America never witness it!

At the beginning of the French Revolution, which was the most beneficent explosion that history records, two acres out of every five in all France belonged to the Church. And the Church was so good a judge of land, that, in a large number of parishes, the Church's two acres were worth more than the people's three. France was then in a condition similar to that of England before Henry the Eighth broke up the ecclesiastical institutions, and secularized their property; that is, stopped exempting it from taxation!

Now, there are but two conceivable ways in which the increase of Catholic property can be kept within safe, just, and reasonable bounds in the United States, and the country be saved from the necessity of a Henry the Eighth or a French Revolution. One is by destroying popular faith in the fictions upon which the external part of the Catholic system rests. But this will be a slow process. It can only result from the gradual advance of our race in knowledge, health, happiness, dignity, and courage. And it will be the more slow because large numbers of the Protestants still adhere to several of the grosser and less picturesque of these fictions.

But the other method is, simply, to tax all ecclesiastical property, as other property is taxed. Let every tub stand upon its own bottom. Let all the property, I repeat, which the State protects, pay its just proportion to the State's support.

Catholics themselves, if they will study the past, cannot intelligently object to this measure, because it would supply the great lack in their system. Viewed merely as an organization, the Roman Catholic Church has only one serious defect: There is no provision in it against its excessive development. Hence we find in the cities of the South of Europe and of South America such swarms of ecclesiastics, such masses of ecclesiastical property, that Catholics themselves, devout and faithful Catholics, are among the foremost in urging a reduction of the ecclesiastical orders.

There is only one just and sure mode of proceeding in this matter: It is to add every portion of the Church's estate to the tax list.

A large portion of what religion includes may be fairly classed under the head of luxury. And who will deny that luxuries are fair objects of taxation? In religion, as in common life, there is the bread and meat, and there is also the turtle and champagne; there is the poor man's fustian, and the rich lady's velvet.

Consider our Trinity Church, for example, so pleasing an object to us all, at the head of Wall Street. A few years ago, the attendance at this costly temple on Sunday was so small that you might have safely tried Carlyle's experiment—fired a pistol across the church, in at one window and out at another, without much danger of hitting a Christian. Of late years, on the contrary, it is often well attended, and sometimes crowded. I once asked the clergyman in charge of the church, the late lamented Doctor Vinton—a genial soul—what he thought was the reason of this remarkable increase in the congregation. His robust and honest answer was this: "The blessing of God upon good music."

They have, as you know, a very fine organ, a highly accomplished organist, a choir of highly trained men and boys to sing, an orchestra of stringed and wind instruments, a beautiful chime of bells, and several clergymen trained to chant the service in harmony with the music. I suppose the entire performance cannot cost less than a thousand dollars a Sunday. I have enjoyed it once or twice very much, and I always recommend friends visiting the city by no means to overlook this interesting lion.

Nay more, I honor the principle of employing the fine arts in the most elevated act of the human mind. If it devolved upon me to create a church, its services should be, in part, the most magnificent exhibition of all that man has ever accomplished in the way of architecture, painting, sculpture, poetry, and eloquence; for one of my main objects should be to exalt and glorify man. But never would I cripple and degrade my church by putting it on the free list, by throwing any part of the burden of supporting it upon fellow citizens who cherish, perhaps, the most opposite ideas, who would hold in contempt or aversion all the splendors of my temple, preferring plain benches, walls unadorned, and merry camp-meeting hymns.

Now, in the way of music, the greatest benefactors the people of the United States have ever known, next to the great European composers, are such men as Theodore Thomas, Max Maretzek, Carl Zerrahn, and others of their class. They do more in any week of their lives to promote among us a love of good music, than Trinity Church has ever accomplished during the whole period of its existence; and this they have done in the most legitimate and honorable way, as their chosen mode of earning their livelihood. But these gentlemen are taxed every time they lift their baton. Every hall and opera house in which they perform is taxed. Surely, if any musicians should be exempt it should not be the clergy and orchestra of Trinity Church, the servants of a rich corporation; but Thomas, Maretzek, and Zerrahn, who minister to the enjoyment, and elevate the taste, of millions of their fellow citizens every year.

How heavily rests the burden of life upon the shoulders, and upon the heart, too, of an average citizen and virtuous father of a family. For ten years he toils and saves, denying himself many alluring enjoyments, in order that he may make a first payment upon a modest home for those he loves. Then he works and saves for another five years to pay off the mortgage. When all is done, when he is at last the proud possessor of the nest that shelters his family, he goes, like a man, every November and pays a tax upon it, from one hundred to three hundred dollars.

The little house in which I have lived for the last fifteen years, I shall have to pay a tax upon in fifteen days, of about two hundred and twenty dollars. It was about that last year, and, in New York, revolutions never go backward.

But, right before my eyes, as I used to come down the steps, rises a lofty and luxurious edifice, the property of a few rich men which they only care to use four hours a week. It is worth, I suppose, half a million of dollars; and if it were fairly taxed it would place in Mr. Green's treasury in the course of next month, not less than ten thousand dollars. But it will not pay him one dollar, because it has two steeples upon it and is named in honor of the patron saint of England who slew the dragon.

But mark, if a mob should burn it, the tax-payers of New York would be expected to pay every dollar of the damage.

At this moment, a number of very worthy gentlemen, who stand justly high in this community, are building, in the Fifth Avenue, edifices for their Sunday edification which cost seven or eight hundred thousand dollars. The land alone costs three hundred and fifty thousand. These gentlemen have a perfect right to build elegant and costly churches, if they can afford it, and if it accords with the principles of their religion, of which they alone are to be the judges. I merely wish to remark that churches of this character may fairly be classed as luxuries, and as such are peculiarly adapted to taxation. Many good Christians deeply lament the expenditure of so much money upon edifices which minister to the desires of so few, and to those few during only a few hours in every week. But I tell those lamenting Christians that the only way to keep within bounds the erection of costly churches is to subject them to just and equal taxation.

The New York Tribune tells us that our Episcopal brethren are about to erect in this city a cathedral that is to cost two millions of dollars. It will more likely cost five; and there is one gentleman interested in the scheme who could build it outright, gold candle-sticks and all, by assigning to it his surplus income for two years. Among the subscriptions already received are two of a hundred thousand dollars each. I would put it to the justice of the American people, and I would submit it to the heavy-laden tax-payers of New York, if it is fair to the laboring men of this city to exempt such an edifice as that from taxation.

If it is to be exempt from the charge of supporting the Government, then the Government ought to be exempt from the charge of protecting it.

There is a particular reason why this subject should be considered now.

Every century has its pet virtue; ours is benevolence. The works of philanthropists, and, above all, the work of philanthropists, appeals so powerfully to the heart, and so kindles the imagination, that it is easy for us to attach an exaggerated value to them.

In truth, no virtue more needs restraining and guiding than our benevolence. If I may trust my own very limited observation of life, I should say that, generally, a very benevolent character is a weak character. A weak character is, usually, extremely sensitive to the approbation of others, runs readily to vanity and an ignoble lust of glory, and, in its extreme development, is not far from madness.

The strong are just. And justice is a far rarer, nobler, higher, more difficult, thing than benevolence.

But benevolence being the popular virtue of the century, there is a general propensity to win its easy and lavish honors. Hard old money-makers, after a the Free Religious movement comprehend something more than an advanced religious philosophy or criticism, and still be "free" as ever? I am inclined to think that it may. The example of the Free Religious society of New Milford, and others, like that of Mr. Frothingham in New York, Potter in New Bedford, Vickers in Cincinnati, Conway in London, and what Theodore Parker accomplished thirty years ago, confirm this. Thus far, it seems to me, the movement has not emphasized the importance of this sufficiently. There are radicals or free thinkers now-a-days everywhere. Every little town or village has more or less of them. Most of them, even the most earnest, appear to feel they have done all that is needed when they subscribe for a liberal paper. I am sorry that even this is not done as generally as it ought to be done.

Mr. Frothingham was right when he said that, if the Free Religious Association, in its recent meeting in New York, had been relatively as well represented by those in sympathy with its thought and spirit as the convention of the popular religion just closed, it would have composed an assembly that in culture, scholarship, and genius, as well as numbers, would have been at least equal to it. What radicals need, in order to make themselves effective for the truth, is to be educated out of their selfishness,—to realize that something more is needed to advance the world than mere theory or criticism; that it is important they should do something for their convictions as well as talk about them—important, not only to the world, but, also, to the attainment of a higher excellence in their lives. Let them imitate the devotion of energy, time, and money, which the devotees of the so-called Evangelical religion exhibit, and their influence and power will be multiplied a hundred-fold, and become speedily triumphant.

"FREE THOUGHT ASSOCIATION OF CLEARFIELD COUNTY, PA."

CLEARFIELD, Pa., Sept. 22, 1873.

Pursuant to adjournment, the "Free Thought Association of Clearfield County" met and organized by electing Samuel Widemire President pro tem., and H. Hoover Secretary. The committee on permanent organization reported the following Platform and Constitution. . . . On motion the Articles were read separately, discussed, and finally adopted as reported.

After signing the Platform and Constitution, the following gentlemen were elected to fill the respective offices named for the term of one year; namely, President, Samuel Widemire; Vice-President, J. C. Richards, M. D.; Secretary, Harry Hoover; Treasurer, George Thorn; Executive Committee, G. W. Caldwell, M. D., David Smith, and Thomas Wall; Committee on By-Laws, J. B. Walters, A. G. Hoyt, and George Thorn. The Association discussed the establishment of a Free Thought Library, and raised funds for its purchase. The Treasurer was requested to act as Librarian, and empowered to choose assistants in making the selections, so as to represent the materialistic, spiritual, and scientific phases of thought in the Society.

On motion of George Thorn, it was ordered that the proceedings of this meeting be sent to the Boston INDEX, Investigator, and Banner of Light, for publication.

Approved: SAMUEL WIDEMIRE, President.
HARRY HOOVER, Secretary.

[Publication of the above has been delayed till a copy of the Platform, which explains the special character of the movement, could be obtained. It is here appended. The Association is reported to us as in effect a "Liberal League."—Ed.]

PLATFORM OF "THE FREE THOUGHT ASSOCIATION OF CLEARFIELD COUNTY, PA."

1. We believe that Nature has endowed all men with the right to think, speak, and act for themselves, and that the true function of government is to secure to the individual the largest liberty compatible with the good of society; that our fathers, with a wise appreciation of this inherent right of man, incorporated into the fundamental law of the land the salutary provision that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

2. We believe in the sacred inviolability of the right of conscience, as enunciated in the foregoing extract, and claim the absolute exercise of the same, untrammelled by any extraneous force whatever.

3. We hold this proposition to be self-evident. That, if we accept a truth upon its simple announcement, we would necessarily, upon the same principle, accept an error. Therefore we believe it to be, not only our privilege, but our positive duty, to employ our Reason in determining what is true and what is false.

4. We believe that in the exercise of this faculty we are not responsible to any self-constituted authority; and that any attempt to abridge the free use of our reason by any organized body, civil, military, or ecclesiastical, is an unwarranted and unnatural assumption of power, a crime against humanity, an insult to the intelligence of the age, and an act of tyranny deserving of the severest censure of mankind.

5. We believe that "he who will not reason is a bigot, and he who does not is a slave."

6. We view with apprehension the machination of religious sects who hope to engraft their theological dogmas upon the Constitution of our country, thereby disfranchising all who dare to think for themselves, or differ from them in opinion; and we will by all lawful means strive to counteract their baleful influence and thwart their nefarious schemes for the perpetuation of antiquated superstition, and the suppression of light and truth.

7. We hold that belief is an involuntary act, and depends upon the nature and amount of evidence, and is therefore without moral merit, or demerit; and earnestly protest against the theological dogma that unquestioning faith is the first duty of man; while disbelievers are the highest crime, and involves eternal ruin.

8. We protest against the horrible doctrine that man is "totally depraved" and that a majority of the human family are destined to eternal torments.

9. We protest against the unjust discrimination in our laws which permits three hundred and fifty millions worth of church-property in the United States to go untaxed, thereby indirectly taxing us for the support of a religion we do not profess.

10. We hold that all so-called divine revelations should be tested by the same rules of criticism that we apply to so-called profane works; and that religious instruction is no part of the business of the common schools.

11. We believe that Reason is the highest and best standard or guide we possess; but as no two individuals are constituted exactly alike, uniformity of opinion is not expected or required.

12. We believe that knowledge, not faith, is the key that unlocks the hidden mysteries of Nature, showing us our true relation thereto, and in the power to which we must look for the redemption of our race.

13. We hail with delight the triumphant march of all-conquering Science, and rejoice to see her stalwart sons deal ponderous blows upon the prison-temples of Superstition and Holy Tradition, demolishing at once the shrine at which ignorant Credulity worshipped, and the prison-cell in which Free Thought was wont to be strangled; and, after clearing away the rubbish, laying broad and deep the foundations of the glorious temple of Truth, at whose portals we count it joy to be found as humble worshippers.

14. To conclude: Our motto is—"Bound to no creed and to no sect confined,

Our home the world, our brethren all mankind.
Do right—do good—be just and kind to all—
Exact the truth, though every sin fall."

In conformity to the above statement of principles, and for the purpose of more effectually maintaining the rights of conscience, free thought, free speech, and liberal education, as well as resisting the encroachments of theocracy,—

We, the undersigned, do hereby associate ourselves together under the title of "THE FREE THOUGHT ASSOCIATION OF CLEARFIELD COUNTY, PA.," to be governed by the following

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS.

"Art. 3. The means employed to attain our object shall be regular local meetings, discursive lectures, and the establishment of a Free Thought Library, and such other means as may be deemed proper by a majority of the members."

NOTE.—The balance of the Constitution, as well as the names of the fifty members signed, I omit as not being interesting to the general reader.

THE IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

[From the Golden Age, Oct. 25.]

A contributor to "The Free Parliament" in a recent number of the Golden Age, takes Mr. Abbot to task for his bold impeachment of Christianity. After giving the several counts in the indictment, the writer quotes Mr. Abbot's definition of Christianity as "the great system of faith and practice which is organized in the Christian Church," a system whose history is "the history of the Christian Church." In antagonism to this definition, the writer says, "No; Christianity is the ideal, and the life of Jesus of Nazareth," and claims that Jesus defines his own religion as "love of God and love of man."

Very well; what Mr. Abbot includes under the term Christianity, and what his critic includes, are two different things. But it is not so well that the critic, after honestly giving Mr. Abbot's definition, should proceed to attack him as if he had levelled his batteries against Christianity, as the critic defines it. In the "Articles of impeachment," I do not find a single specification against "love of God and love of man," or against "the ideal, and the life of Jesus." To oppose to the impeachment an array of Christ's moral and religious sayings is, therefore, nothing to the purpose. The real question to which the critic should address himself is, Granting Christianity to be what Mr. Abbot defines it, is it justly amenable to his charges?

Of course it is allowable to take exception to Mr. Abbot's definition. But that is altogether another issue. It is one, however, of primary importance. If we are to discuss intelligently the claims of Christianity, we ought to be agreed as to the meaning of the term. The current debauched use of the word leads to confusion of thought and unfruitful debate, and lends a convenient cloak to hypocrisy. It will not do to answer that every sect calling itself Christian defines Christianity to suit itself, and excludes whatever does not suit it, and that therefore any scientific definition is impracticable. If Christianity covers everything you have a mind to put into it, then, in the interest of honest thought, it is time to discard the word from common parlance, allowing it only a place among the technical terms which are peculiar to certain handicrafts and trades, and which may be applied differently in each.

Yet neither, on the other hand, in order to a satisfactory definition of Christianity, is it necessary that we should be agreed as to everything that may be rightly included in it. There may be difference of opinion as to some of the details, but there must also be some common ground of agreement, some point of convergence, or else the term assumes too watery a consistency for practical use. Now, in defining a thing, we state that which is characteristic of it; that which isolates it from other things. What, then, is the great characteristic feature of Christianity; what ground of agreement upon which any sect, rightly calling itself Christian, may stand? To say that it is simply "love of God and love of man," is to leave Christianity no distinguishing mark; for the primitive seers, besides Jesus, have inculcated the same insight, and have supported it with the same moral teachings. The religion of Buddha and Confucius would admit of a like definition, and could, therefore, be identified with Christianity. In the interest of clearness of thought and definiteness of language, we must look elsewhere for the distinguishing mark of Christianity?

Is not this to be found in the mediatorship of Christ—not his mediatorship in the natural sense, in the sense that any seer of the race, any man of transcendent excellence, may be said to be a mediator, but a supernatural, a specially-ordained mediatorship, a mediatorship for all time? Around this central idea may be grouped the doctrines of the fall of man, of redemption, of heaven and hell, of the trinity, of grace, election, &c., &c., throughout the whole theological catalogue, all of which may be variously accepted, or rejected, or refined upon, without impairing the germinal idea, which is thus the distinctive, defining feature of Christianity.

Now if Mr. Abbot, holding this germinal idea to be a false, and in some of its aspects, pernicious, one, can show the various doctrines inculcated by Christians to be the outcome of this central conception; and if he can also show that the hierarchical institutions of the past and present, which claim a more or less pronounced position of authority over the human intellect and conscience, are the true historical exponents and administrators of these doctrines—then, leaving the sectaries within the pale to settle their minor differences, he is justified in embracing the entire system, thus elaborated, under the term Christianity, and in bringing to bear upon Christianity, as thus entrenched, his batteries of attack. Then, if he succeed in showing that, whatever temporary and partial benefit this system may have effected, its ultimate result is antagonistic to human development, repressing the intellect, dulling the moral sense, and blocking up the path of social progress, he makes good his articles of impeachment.

Judged from either a friendly or hostile point of view, this impeachment of Christianity ought to do a good work. It ought to compel a clearer demarcation of the Christian and the non-Christian. It ought to shame into a more manly position those milk-and-water souls, who, having surrendered all that is distinctive of Christianity, still fondly cling to the ghost of a name. It is due to the Church, it is due to truth, it is due to common honesty, that those who no longer hold to what is essential in Christianity should no longer seek to cover themselves with the border of its garment.

MR. SPENCER ON HIS ALLEGED CONVERSION.

[From the Haverhill, Mass., Daily Bulletin, Nov. 3, 1873.]

MR. EDITOR: The following letter was called out on this wise: Having heard the various rumors in the city of Rev. Mr. Spencer's conversion to Orthodoxy, and understanding that such had been publicly proclaimed in one of the meetings of a leading church, and seeing the notice of it in the Gazette, I immediately dispatched a letter to him, sending the paper which had the account; also giving a statement of the facts as they had come to me. In justice to him and the people he represents, I hope you will find a place for his reply in your columns.

Yours truly, NEWTON LITTLEFIELD.
HAVERHILL, Nov. 1, 1873.

MY DEAR LITTLEFIELD:—Your letter, together with the paper containing the report that "Mr. Spencer has been converted to the Orthodox faith," is just received, and I hasten to reply.

I cannot imagine how such an absurd story could have originated, unless, possibly, it was by some unaccountable misunderstanding of some playful remark of mine made to some one who "did not know how to take a joke." That it has been for a moment credited by any one of my friends who know my positive anti-Orthodox views, I can only account for upon the supposition that he thought it barely possible that meningitis or softening of the brain might have benighted me of my senses. If I should ever lose my reason, I may embrace Orthodoxy, but not till then. I can, indeed, well see how the story would have gained currency when once it was started, for it seems to lend a little capital to the evidence of the truth of Orthodoxy, and would be gladly appropriated and circulated by the converts of that faith. If I were dead, it could not be denied positively, which to them would no doubt be sufficient reason to believe it positively; but, unlike that brave and good man, Thomas Paine, I am alive to refute the false story of my lapse of faith.

"Mr. Spencer converted to the Orthodox faith?" Indeed! Mr. Spencer, with the whole world, is not moving that way. Orthodoxy itself is moving so fast toward a more rational religion that you can only tell to-day what Orthodoxy once was, not what Orthodoxy now is.

I am, I think, not very far from the Orthodoxy of Mr. Beecher, of Mr. Murray (in his afternoon sermons), of Dr. Loring of Chicago, of Mr. Dudley of Milwaukee, and many other so-called Orthodox preachers, simply because they are so near to Unitarianism. I hope I am not lacking in charity when I say that the principal difference between me and a very large number of the Orthodox and Evangelical preachers, is not a difference of belief so much as a difference of practice. I have felt free to preach all I believe, in the pulpit; many of them feel free to preach all they believe only in private; to a confidential friend when the window is down and door closed. It seems to me that they treat men as children; as spiritual babes, whom they must nurse, and humor, and quiet, by sugaring over the new ideas with the old, and dealing out truth to them in bits at a time, while I have talked to men as though they were grown men, and able to do their own thinking, and were ready for my newest and best thought, spoken frankly and fearlessly. That, I believe, is the principal difference between myself and a good many of the liberal Orthodox preachers of to-day. If I could be converted to a discreet silence, I might be such an "Orthodox" perhaps, but I have never thought that dumb speech, or Gospel truth, spoken so low that no one hears you, ever converts many souls. My Haverhill friends must judge whether I would be likely to join this band of silent Orthodox preachers.

If, on the other hand, is meant, that I have been converted to what was once the Orthodox faith; to the doctrine of the fall of man through Adam, total depravity, vicarious atonement, eternal hell, a private 7th heaven, the deity of the man Jesus, the infallibility of the Bible, and salvation alone through Christ, and kindred doctrines, which, like the vanishing Mo-does, we have no room for now-a-days, but are pushing off into the woods where they can trouble no one, and will soon die of themselves, while civilization and will soon die of themselves, while civilization flanks them and moves on ahead—if, I say, these doctrines are the Orthodox faith, then I most emphatically deny that I am converted to it, and hasten to clear my reputation of a report that is as slanderous as it is false. I respect and love some Orthodox people very much; but some who sit high in the synagogues of Puritanic Haverhill are such unmitigated and notorious swindlers that their piety has not irresistibly drawn me to them, or to their faith. Meanwhile I try to have charity for all Christian knaves, whether statesmen or shoemakers, and I ask in return the charity that does not suspect me of insanity, because I was forsooth once afflicted with a disturbance of cerebral functions.

Yours for a rational religion, now as ever,
W. H. SPENCER.

PAUL GOWER.

OF

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN LIFE.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

A SHORT CHAPTER INTRODUCING A VERY LONG ONE.

I think the sample of Miss Kate Sabin's letters to her lover, already submitted to the reader, will not render him particularly desirous of having them reported in full; and, indeed, entertain too much respect for the very serious nature of the subjects to which she chose mainly to address herself (after her first epistle), as well as for the young woman's unquestionable sincerity, to exhibit more of either than is absolutely necessary for the development of this entirely truthful story, in the undress of an unfortunate style, slipshod grammar, and ultra-feminine eccentricity of punctuation. It was not Kate's fault if she did not write as good English as Mrs. Hannah More, when that highly respectable person sent a letter of remonstrance and confutation to a certain member of the French National Convention, whose declared theological opinions could hardly have appeared more reprehensible to his admonitory than did Paul's milder form of heterodoxy to his mistress. But, lest I should be suspected of an attempt at confounding the matter with her unlucky manner of treating it (which would be equally unfair and invidious), I shall relate what now becomes essential to this narrative as unexceptionably, and with as much condensation, as is possible.

The correspondence, then, went on, the pair interchanging a letter about once in five weeks, very little to their mutual satisfaction. For Kate would persist in her well-meant efforts at proselytism, until, in her epistles, theology assumed the proportions of that orthodox comparison, the "sack" in Falstaff's famous bill; while the affection on which poor Paul would fain have nourished a passion which absence had not, as yet, diminished, may be likened to the half-penny-worth of bread. It seemed, in fact, only thrown in as a make-weight, or a bribe to secure a favorable reception of its accompaniment. Like most of her sex, Miss Sabin had adopted her religious opinions with implicit faith, taking everything for granted, and experiencing none of those doubts and difficulties which so frequently beset the masculine soul in its efforts at reconciling dogma with the natural, inherent convictions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, which are common to all of us, and which sometimes get the better of, and sometimes succumb to, authority. That is a faculty peculiar to women; they can ignore, and put out of sight, all that militates against what they wish to believe; while a man, if he be in earnest, must face such questions, and render some kind of answer. Kate never understood this; harboring no scruple herself, and being perfectly in earnest, she was too narrow-minded to admit impediment in the path of others; besides, she made the ordinary mistake of confounding scepticism with moral perversity. Paul was a heretic by his own admission—he dared to dispute the truth of what she found in the Bible, and accepted as an infallible revelation of the will of God; that was the one terrible, lamentable fact, patent above all other earthly considerations, and impelling her either to convert him, or to terminate a connection which could come to no good, and which she believed was forbidden by Scripture. She did not, indeed, know the full extent of his heterodoxy, but more than was sufficient. So, every letter she sent him partook more and more of the character of a sermon, until its recipient, after vainly trying to evade the discussion thus forced upon him—to postpone it indefinitely—to beg off—was fairly driven to desperation, and impelled to turn and rush upon what he, perhaps, felt was an inevitable conclusion.

As all her appeals, arguments, and remonstrances were only variations of the one formula, "Behold the Book," there is the less need of shocking anybody's susceptibilities with many extracts, some few of which (edited and corrected) must be laid before the reader. They shall be selected from the last letter Paul ever received from her in America—one written in condemnation of his going to a Universalist church on Sundays—that of the Rev. E. H. Chapin, then on Broadway, a gentleman for whom, at that period of his life, he had a great regard and admiration.

"I would advise you," urged Kate, "to be very cautious how you listen to a man who preaches such deadly, soul-destroying doctrine. Does he take his texts from the Scriptures? because, if so, I am entirely at a loss to imagine how he can reconcile such teachings with the plainly-declared assurances of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who, in many places, expressly informs us that there is a world of suffering beyond the grave—a hell, wherein the wicked will be tormented forever and ever. It is an awful fact that some of the most distinct assertions of this proceeded from His mouth: and 'shall mortal man be more just than God?' shall a man be more pure than his Maker?" (Job iv., 17.) Besides, what inducement can a believer in universal salvation hold out to the sinner to love and serve God, if, without repentance, his condition is, at last, to be equal with that of the righteous? 'Thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented.' (Luke xvi., 25.) I should like you to get your Bible and carefully study the following texts, that you may judge for yourself whether there is any hope for the impenitent wicked. Do not tire of them: Psalms lii., 5, and xlii., 7; Daniel xii., 2; Matthew xxv., 41 and 46; Mark iii., 29; Luke xvi., 26; John v., 29; Romans vi., 21 and 23; Ephesians v., 6; II. Thessalonians i., 8 and 9; Revelation xxi., 8. You say that you wish that the harsher parts of my creed were dead letters to me, as they are to a certain relative of mine, who is yet a religious girl. Of course I know who you mean, and though it is not for me to pronounce upon anybody ('Judge not, that ye be not judged,' Matthew vii., 1), I may in charity hope that Esther Franklin is not one of that very numerous class of nominal Christians and real self-deceivers who, in a great measure, trust to their own natural righteousness (which we are told is no better than filthy rags) for redemption, instead of the blood of the Lamb. It is a grief to me that any part of the Scriptures should be neglected by her; if I believe in any portion of God's word I must believe in all. I am not to pick and choose, or to pretend to be more merciful than Him who will not allow one sinner to escape his wrath in any other way than through the sacrifice of His Son. I must not 'shun to declare his whole counsel.' (Acts xx., 27.) 'Yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel.' (I. Corinthians ix., 16.) I do hope you will seriously consider these things, and not leave the safety of your immortal soul in a state of uncertainty. You will, I have no doubt, think this, like some of the others, a strange letter, but I must be candid with you. I have thought, and still think, that I am wrong in keeping up a correspondence with one whom I dare not accept as a husband if it came to the point. (Don't think I do not feel this.) However dear you might be to me, if we were united without the sanction of our Heavenly Father, what blessing could possibly result from such an unscriptural marriage? For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? (II. Corinthians xiv. and xv.) I write this because I wish for a proper understanding between us, and to avoid future unhappiness. The longer I live, the more determined I am not to yoke myself to one whose religion does not correspond, in all respects, with the Holy Bible."

Whereunto Paul replied at altogether unexpected length, as will be found in the next chapter.

"CLEGOMEN, with a small stock of sermons, frequently speculate too boldly on the shortness of their hearers' memories, but they probably seldom carry the practice as far as the reverend gentleman whose sermons have been subjected by one of his congregation, 'a great statistician and an old resident,' to the following minute classification. A friend of the 'great statistician' thus reports the result of his inquiries: 'His theory is that during thirteen years of the present incumbency, the general stock of sermons possessed by the vicar has been preached forty-eight times, or, as he says, has made forty-eight revolutions, and that they are already far advanced in the forty-ninth cycle. He thinks that when they have gone through fifty revolutions they will be tolerably well worn out—seeing that they were ancient when they came into the possession of the present owner. He considers that he has actually fixed the date of their composition, which he believes to be between the thirty-fifth and fortieth years of George III., or about seventy-five years ago. Two of them, which are known as the 'Astronomical Sermons,' he says, are taken from Durham's Astro-Theology, published in 1780, and abound with the errors of that date. Another is supposed to have been written on the occasion of the earthquake at Lisbon, and is known as the 'Trembling Sermon,' being suited to occasions of public calamity. It has already done duty on the occasions of two revolutions in Spain, twice for commercial panics in England, once for the Crimean war, and recently for the Franco-German war, with a few other similar occasions. They are taken from some early numbers of the Church Magazine.'"—Pall Mall Gazette, April 23, 1871.

"THE FOURTEENTH session of the Church Congress concluded last Friday at Bath. . . . The Church Herald says: 'The Church Congress was certainly not up to the average mark, either as regards subjects, attendance, or debate. . . . The High Church party was very badly represented among the set speakers. There was a tolerable crowd of clerical gals in queer hats, cloaks, and pectoral crosses. The service at Bath Abbey was simply disgraceful. Except as regards attendance, the Congress was a dismal failure. There was less earnestness, less power, less reality, less eloquence, and more vulgarity and superficial twaddle, than at any similar meeting we have attended.' The Nonconformist says: 'The Church Congress is well worthy of sympathy and respect. The uproarious scenes which have enlivened the recent assembly, as well as former ones, show indeed that the social supremacy of an Established Church does not necessarily make its manners superior to those of less privileged Christians.' The Tablet, as those of less privileged Christians, is not nearly so civil. It says: 'The only unity possible in the Anglican Church is the unity of discord. The Church of England is certainly a unique institution, but why do its members mock God by pretending to care about truth? Is there anything in the world, or out of it, which they really care about except their own opinion?'"—London Graphic.

SONNET.

AFTER READING THE MOTTO, "IN GOD WE TRUST," ON A COIN.

'Tis said the Greeks, when Troy had proved her force,
Made feigned retreat, and had a story spread
Of wondrous virtues in a wooden horse,
And stuffed him full, the rogues! from tail to head,
A stratagem by which, though rather thin
To modern people, such as you and I am,
The horse and Trojans both were taken in;
Which played the devil with the town of Priam.
The men who now besiege the Constitution
Would also like to introduce a hobby;
But by a process some call evolution
The ways of things have changed in war and lobby;
So they, like true descendants of Loyola,
To get him in have put him on the Dollar!

GLIMPSSES.

A DISPUTE is going on in Nature about the hemodromograph, the sphygmograph, the cardiograph, and the cardio-sphygmograph. It ought to be conducted in the Graphic.

IN ANOTHER COLUMN will be found the reply of Mr. W. H. Spencer, our friend and editorial contributor, whose poor health has for many months deprived us of his valuable articles, to the absurd stories circulated of late that he had been converted to Orthodoxy. It is a juicy letter, not very well adapted to console the authors of the slander.

WE LEARN from Mr. H. L. Green, of Syracuse, N. Y., that the newly elected chief of the Onondaga tribe of Indians is named "Samuel May Ha-day-ahoh," in honor of Rev. Samuel J. May, of that city. The Indians of that region have good cause to remember with gratitude one of the best friends they ever had, and one of the manliest and sweetest men that ever trod the soil of America.

MR. C. D. B. MILLS, of Syracuse, N. Y., has been nominated for State Senator by the temperance party of his county. Any party honors itself by putting forward such men as candidates. Mr. Mills is too well known as a radical writer and lecturer to need any mention of ours; but it is a cheering sign of the times to see men of ideas and spotless character not only nominated for office, but also willing to stand.

SPECIAL ATTENTION is called to Mr. Potter's notice in another column. By his permission, the essay of Mr. Parton and the Appendix are printed in this number of THE INDEX; and we hope that all who read it will think it, as we do, a most timely paper for circulation. Will not the Liberal Leagues send orders to Mr. Potter for one hundred or more copies of the Tract he advertises? No better "campaign document" could be found.

A VERY PLEASANT reception was given by Mrs. Sargent on the evening of November 6, at which Mr. Sumner, Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. Sewall, and many others were present. The distinguished English republican makes as many friends in private as in public. The health of Mr. Sumner is very greatly improved, though he still has to endure, at times, a great deal of pain. Yet we have his own authority for the statement that, in the opinion of all his physicians, he "has no organic disease." It was the ruffian blow of Preston S. Brooks that has entailed upon him this heritage of suffering, affecting as it did his whole nervous system, and especially the spinal cord. Fifty assassinations would have cost him less agony. To few men has it been given to do and to suffer more for human freedom.

IF THE MAIN object of the Independent, in pleading for the admission of the Universalists into the Evangelical Alliance, was to secure the expunging of the everlasting punishment dogma from the Alliance's platform, it went to work in the clumsiest way conceivable. Why did it not go to work directly and avowedly for that object? Such a course would have brought up the question what everlasting salvation through Christ can possibly mean, when everlasting damnation through Adam is given up. It would then have come out that, if men are not liable to damnation, they have no use for salvation; and the whole theology of the Alliance would have tumbled about its ears. Why should the Independent seek to introduce into the citadel of Evangelicalism those who would at once betray it to the enemy? The Alliance had too much good sense to knock out the underpinning of their house before they had got safely out of it themselves. If the Independent is liberal enough to throw away the everlasting punishment dogma, it ought to have enough logic to throw away its corollaries.

ries. The unreasonableness in this whole matter was not on the side of the Alliance.

THE CLOSING SENTENCE of Mr. Higginson's article in another column is so beautifully and exquisitely true that we cannot forbear calling special attention to it: "When shall we learn that, the purer the heart, the less it will shrink from the conclusions of the pure intellect?" What a glorious sermon might be preached from that text! No better motto could be found to be inscribed on the temple of scientific religion. The pure heart is needed to make the intellect pure. Selfishness, sensuality, egotism, cowardice, partisanship, the love of victory that so often usurps the place of the love of truth, all darken the mind of man and enfeeble the eye of reason. Where they are absent, the intellect is pure enough to obey the natural laws of thought, and the pure heart as easily adapts itself to what the pure intellect discovers as the young plant grows towards the incoming light. The spirit of science is unqualified devotion to the truth of Nature; the method of science is undeviating fidelity to the laws of thought; and all the triumphs of science have come from the union of these two—have been born from the wedlock of the pure intellect and the pure heart. Few comprehend the mighty revolution now going on in the religious life of the world, or perceive that the changes of belief which continually come to notice are, at bottom, all caused by the unsuspected influence of modern science; but, although no little dismay is felt as time-honored opinions melt slowly away like snow in April, there is infinite reassurance in the thought that the pure intellect can discover nothing which the pure heart will not at last rejoice in. Set your faces, then, to the East, and greet advancing day without wasting farewells on departing night.

BELOW is the petition, referred to in our last issue, for the repeal of the Act of Congress exempting church property from taxation in the District of Columbia. It is a modification (with additions) of the petition of the San José Liberal League, which is adapted for circulation in California alone, while this is adapted for circulation throughout the United States. Will not the liberals everywhere interest themselves in this matter, and send us long lists of names for transmission to Congress? All lists received by us shall be acknowledged in THE INDEX, and forwarded without unnecessary delay. The "Anti-Exemption Petition" is as follows:—

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:—

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of the United States, would hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal the first section of the Act approved June 17, 1870, entitled "An Act exempting from taxes certain property in the District of Columbia," etc., and providing that "all churches and school-houses, and all buildings, grounds and property appurtenant thereto, and used in connection therewith, in the District of Columbia, shall be exempt from any and all taxes and assessments, national, municipal or county." We ask this for the following reasons:—

1. This part of said Act we understand to be at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Since the exemption from taxation of churches, parsonages, ecclesiastical houses and sectarian schools in the District of Columbia is precisely equivalent in effect to a direct appropriation by Congress for their support, we conceive this measure to violate what all the exponents of the Constitution declare to have been its manifest intent and design,—namely, to sever all religious organizations from any connection with or dependence upon the civil government, except for equal and impartial protection. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

2. This part of said Act we conceive to be also contrary to equity and justice, inasmuch as its effect is to increase our relative proportion of the National taxes, to the end of relieving altogether from taxation certain churches and church properties in the District of Columbia. We consider it, therefore, to be UNJUST.

3. All history shows that the effect of exempting churches from taxation is to accumulate property in the hands of ecclesiastical bodies to a very dangerous extent, and at last to compel resort to confiscation as the only means of escaping the great evils thus generated. The examples of England, of Italy, and of Mexico, of Spain, Austria, and France, are sufficient warnings against adopting a policy which is hostile to American ideas and American institutions. That the non-taxation of church property is tending to the same results here as elsewhere is evident from the fact that, while the number of church-members in the United States was not doubled between 1860 and 1870, the value of church property during the same period was quadrupled, advancing from $87,328,801 to $364,483,581. At the same rate, its value in 1890 will be over $1,418,000,000; and such rapid accumulation of wealth in ecclesiastical hands is most perilous to civil and religious liberty. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNSAFE.

For the reasons, consequently, that this part of said Act is unconstitutional, unjust, and unsafe, we respectfully ask that it be forthwith repealed.

TWO VIEWS OF FREE RELIGION.

There are two views of the free religious movement among its own friends which lead to methods in some points radically unlike. One of these we will call the sympathetic view; the other, the intellectual view. It may not be amiss to say something about them here.

Those who take the sympathetic view of the free religious movement are chiefly charmed by the prospect it opens up of getting rid of the mutual jealousies, heart-burnings, rivalries, antagonisms, hatreds, which are so sadly conspicuous in the religious history of Christendom. The time has come, they think, for all these things to cease; the world, they hold, has begun to be tired of the separations produced by hostile creeds, and to long for the unity of brotherly love notwithstanding the variety of individual beliefs. Henceforth let all those who, in whatever ecclesiastical fellowship or no-fellowship they may chance to find themselves, turn their faces to the future,—all those who in any sect or denomination or church have caught the spirit of onward movement and higher religious life,—lay aside forever the feelings that now divide them, and extend to each other, across all barriers of sect or creed, a loving and helping hand of true fellowship. Let Catholics, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, Universalists, Unitarians, Free-thinkers, Deists, Infidels, Conservatives and Radicals of all kinds, waive their differences; and especially let all who represent the progressive wing of these various fellowships unite in a fellowship as large as the love of truth and the love of man.

Such a view as this, which emphasizes one of the most vital and elevating tendencies of the free religious reform, leads to a corresponding emphasis on the simple yet grand truths of which all humanity is possessed in virtue of its common nature and long experience. It delights in moral progress, ideal excellence, devout upward aspiration, and so forth. It leads to distaste, if not positive dislike, of all that would call attention to differences of opinion; it inclines rather to flank than to oppose the errors of the past; it fosters a disposition to shun the hard and clean-cut antitheses by which the logic of exact science climbs from truth to truth, and prefers to let the world grow as insensibly as possible out of the superstitions of its childhood; it shrinks from the clash of definite convictions set over against each other, and prefers to contemplate the imperceptible gradations by which even black can be shaded off into white; it has in it nothing military, nothing aggressive, nothing even of the analytic spirit which seeks to learn the true scope of all opinions by following them out persistently to their remotest and most unwelcome corollaries. On the contrary, this sympathetic view of Free Religion develops a spirit of conciliation which, while desirous of encouraging to the utmost the new interpretations of religion and of diffusing everywhere the new light they shed on human life, nevertheless promotes comprehensiveness and tenderness of feeling rather than breadth, depth, and strength of thought, or energy, decision, and effectiveness of action. Devoted to truth, it yet forgets that all of truth the world has ever gained has been won by the mailed hand of conquest; that the "struggle for existence" which is the condition of all evolution is but another name for the eternal law of battle; that the opinions which have fought their way to permanence by destroying all antagonist opinions are the most signal instance of "survival of the fittest," and have no other title to be considered the TRUTH than the indestructible vitality by which they have risen superior to their rivals and vanquished them in the warfare of ideas. In short, the sympathetic view, winning as it is in its spirit and tendency, creates a disposition to wipe out the distinctions by which this differs from that, to avoid all controversy and conflict, and to adopt such a method of reform as shall seem to cast no disparaging reflections on the evils to be reformed.

In contrast with this sympathetic view is the intellectual view of Free Religion. It sets no less value on harmony of sentiment and fraternal good-will, and aims no less earnestly to secure these blessings for all mankind; it deprecates no less sincerely the mischiefs of partisanship and sectarian ambition, and studies no less continuously to pave the way for better things. But it clearly discerns that unity of feeling depends on certain necessary conditions, chief among which is unity of principle, of purpose, of endeavor. So far as this depends on unity of thought, just so far it declares the necessity of unity of thought. What is it that prevents harmonious relations among religious bodies to-day? Not "pure cussedness," but rather fidelity to principles which admit of no compromise or conciliation. Instead of blaming bigotry or intolerance or even persecution, it sees that these horrid evils most frequently spring out of a praiseworthy devotion to mistaken, and therefore injurious, ideas; it sees that the divisions of mankind on points of special belief or opinion are absolutely incurable so long as these points of belief or opinion are deemed fundamental; it sees that the only way to establish peace is to detach men from adhesion to these points as of supreme importance, and that the only way to do this radically is to expose the falsity they contain. If men believe particular dogmas to be true, ought they to do otherwise than to act on such belief? Ought they not to refuse to waive them for the sake of any sentimental union based on neutrality between truth and falsehood? Is there any higher virtue than allegiance to truth at the cost of all other considerations? If the Baptist, for instance, believes that membership in the church is the one thing needful, that baptism is the only door of admission, that immersion is the only valid mode of baptism, and that the right to partake of the Lord's Supper is a privilege indissolubly attached to church-membership, does not "open communion" become to him synonymous with abandonment of all his most cherished convictions, and does not the clamor against "close communion," raised so thoughtlessly by many who profess to share these very convictions, necessarily seem treasonable and impious as well as illogical and absurd? Would not the thorough-going Baptist be recreant to his own conscience, if he consented to "commune" with persons whom in his heart he regards as not entitled to sit at the "communion table" at all? Is it not clear as noonday that the only way to establish "open communion" is to show the unscripturalness (which to all Baptists is tantamount to the untruth) of Baptist doctrines? Appeals to sympathy, to natural affection, to merely human considerations of any sort, must appear to the dyed-in-the-wool Baptist as so many temptations of the devil. The only way to rid him of his exclusiveness is to dye him of some other color,—to change his innermost convictions of truth. To a broadly human fellowship the Baptist's tenets are an insuperable obstacle; and the intellectual view of Free Religion rests on perception of the impossibility of reconciling irreconcilables. The Baptist owes it to his own manhood, so long as he is a Baptist, to obey the logic of Baptist doctrines, and refuse to "commune" with any but his fellow-believers. Hence the condition of establishing the universal fraternity longed for by all sympathetic natures is to convince the world of higher truth.

Recognizing, then, the hard fact that all-inclusive harmony is impossible among men so long as their intellects bind them to convictions which make it impossible, the intellectual view of Free Religion leads to corresponding methods. Little is accomplished by seeking to divert men's attention from their clashing convictions to other convictions held in common; the root of division remains. What is imperatively demanded is the wisdom of courage,—the surgeon's courage, if you please, who hesitates not to use the knife for the sake of the patient. Perhaps the knife's edge cuts his own sympathetic heart as deeply as it cuts the quivering flesh to which he applies it: nevertheless, he applies it. So is it with the religious reformer. The seeming roughness and incisiveness of his method, cutting into the tenderest spots of the human heart, exposing the emptiness and falsity of beliefs venerated by the world as guaranteed by divine revelation, uprooting institutions which rest on the most sacred sentiments and convictions of the people, are dictated by no callousness of feeling or recklessness of results, but rather by knowledge that excision is more merciful than mortification. To shrink from inflicting the pain thus caused would be inhumanity,—as of the parent whose misplaced tenderness for a wounded child refuses the painful surgery which may be indispensable to its life. In vain will you preach harmony, fraternity, brotherly love, while you leave undisturbed the religious beliefs which make men enemies to each other. Be the pain, the exasperation, the uproar what they may, it is mercy to let in the daylight upon the hoary lies that pass for truth, and that pledge the world to a tyranny enjoined by faith. Drive the ploughshare straight through the tangled weeds that pre-empt the soil, and make way for the cereals whose ripened grain shall yield the bread of life. Sickle or scythe or plough,—sarcasm, invective, persuasion, appeal, or argument,—it matters not: let each use the tool he possesses according to his skill. So long as the love of truth governs him, and not the love of self,—so long as the good of mankind, and not lust of prominence or profit, kindles his soul,—so long is the reformer's work beneficent, in spite of all temporary commotions, throes, or rages.

There need be no fear that a bad institution, or an outgrown one, will not find a substitute, if it is wanted.—no fear that the false, or the partially false, belief will not be replaced by a truer. Even agitation for reform that is founded upon great and egregious mistake will do more good than harm, by bringing out the hitherto unsuspected or ill-appreciated merits of the old. No reason exists for discontent with other methods of reform than those we ourselves incline to; all sincere methods are in order that aim at the right end, and the law of "natural selection" will winnow out the blundering ones. This is the peculiarity of the intellectual as contrasted with the sympathetic view of Free Religion—that it penetrates through existing discords of feeling to their cause, and, finding it in the conflict of truth with error in the human mind, aims to convert the discord into concord by putting knowledge in the place of ignorance. This done, fraternity and fellowship of spirit will come with knowledge as surely as heat comes with light.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The essay on "Taxation of Church Property," by Mr. James Parton, read at the recent Convention of the Free Religious Association in New York, has been published by the Association in Tract form. The essay presents a very important subject in a most forcible and attractive manner. It was received by the large audience that heard it with the greatest enthusiasm. The Tract also contains in an Appendix an able letter, printed last winter in the New York Tribune, from a distinguished Roman Catholic clergyman of New York, taking the same position on the question that the essay takes, and adding valuable testimony to the validity of its argument. This Appendix was subjoined by Mr. Parton specially for this Tract, and is not connected with the essay as elsewhere printed.

The Tract is a most timely one, and should be widely circulated, especially among members of Legislatures, and in States where the Constitutions are undergoing revision. One gentleman has already ordered one hundred copies for this purpose. Liberal Leagues would do well thus to aid its circulation. Price of the Tract,—singly, 10 cents; package of ten, 60 cents; of one hundred, $3.00. It can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass.

STRAIGHT FROM THE HEART.

The following communication came to me, some time ago, from a young girl of the purest and most truthful nature, who had been brought up under Evangelical influences, and with whom I had never had any conversation on religious matters. I have more than once heard the same feeling stated before, but never with more touching simplicity and sweetness:—

"I want to tell you something, and see what you think of it, and if I am very wicked. As long as I tried to think of Christ as I'd been taught to, it seemed to me there were two Gods. To be sure, I was told not to pray to him; but I never could get rid of that idea, and it troubled and puzzled me not a little. All at once it came to me, about a year ago,—not from anything I had heard or read, for I didn't 'study up' the matter at all, and I was surrounded by anything but 'radical' influences,—that Jesus was only a man. I can't tell you how relieved and happy I felt; it was like a revelation. And ever since I have felt so much nearer to God,—so much surer of His Fatherly love! Was this a very unnatural thing? My friends would think so, but I can't help it. I didn't try to be naughty."

So strong is the influence of early training that even this innocent girl cannot quite lay aside the fear lest she be "naughty" in discovering that a human being is a human being. As if one should say: "My teacher told me that two and two made five; but one day it flashed upon me that two and two made four, and ever since I have found my arithmetic very easy. Was this very unnatural?" How strangely we are taught to distrust the plain truth, as something dangerous! When shall we learn that, the purer the heart, the less it will shrink from the conclusions of the pure intellect? T. W. H.

AN EXPLANATION.

A great writer lays it down as a maxim, that it is never worth while to explain. Make your statement as clearly as you can, and let it go. If it is not understood, wait till it is. The drift of your doctrine is the best interpreter. The objection to explanations is, that they either convey a humiliating affront, or simply a humiliating confession. They import either that your hearer is a dunce, or that you are a dunce yourself. On one side or the other, there must be a lack of brains. The advice is, no doubt, in the main, good. To explain is a weakness; there are cases, however, in which the weakness may be pardonable. We hope the present may be considered one of them.

The President of the Free Religious Association, in opening his address at the recent Convention, used this language, as quoted in THE INDEX: "It will be seen and acknowledged that we are not a clique of sentimentalists who mistake emotions for ideas, and feelings for facts; or a small army of iconoclasts, men without faith themselves, who are bent on destroying the faith of their neighbors,—a group of godless 'Materialists,' 'disciples of Voltaire,' 'followers of Volney or Paine,' who, destitute of religion themselves, are anxious that religion should be banished from society." This language gave great offence to the honest editor of the Investigator, who calls it denunciation. "As the followers of no other teachers are denounced by Mr. Frothingham, we presume he intended his pointed and offensive remarks for such as we are." "Mr. Frothingham's obnoxious words fell on us like a wet blanket, and we are forced to exclaim, more in sorrow than in anger, as one did anciently, 'And thou too, Brutus!'"

Now, in all modesty we would submit that the "presumption," in this instance, should be on the other side. The speaker in question has certainly taken some considerable pains to declare that, in his opinion, the phrase "godless Materialists" was "a vile phrase," inasmuch as all godless people were not Materialists, neither were all Materialists godless people. Last winter he delivered a lecture on Feuerbach, which gave apparent satisfaction to the Investigator, and was certainly a sincere, if not a strong, defence of the most prominent philosophic atheist of this generation. Two years before, he delivered a lecture on the "Beliefs of the Unbelievers," which, whatever its defects, has never been charged with scornful depreciation of men like Voltaire, Volney, Diderot, or Paine. This lecture the Investigator praised and recommended to its readers with remarkable cordiality. All this surely affords ground for a presumption that Mr. Frothingham did not mean to denounce the leaders of opinion whose good fame the Investigator is so anxious to defend.

Perhaps the editor suspects the President of cowardice, surmises that he kept his bold opinions for Boston, but judged it inexpedient to air them in New York. Such a suspicion might be pardonable, if he were not known in New York as an "infidel" preacher of "pronounced" views,—if his opinions had not been repeated many times in public discourses which have been printed,—if that very lecture on the "Beliefs of the Unbelievers" had not been published in New York,—or if the attitude he assumed at the recent Convention had been in other respects that of a trimmer.

Having said so much, to put the Investigator in the position of one who has not pushed his investigations as far as he might, or exercised his equal perspicacity of reasoning, we will mortify him still more—in the spirit of love—"more in sorrow than in anger"—by explaining the mystery before which he stands bewildered. If he will read attentively the report in THE INDEX, which was copied from the Tribune, which printed from the author's own manuscript, he will see that the expressions, "Materialists," "disciples of Voltaire," "followers of Volney and Paine," are printed between inverted commas,—a practice in frequent use with writers who wish to express, not their own opinion, but that of an adversary, or a dissident. Bearing in mind the popular misjudgment of the Association he represented, bethinking himself also of the identification of it in the public mind with certain monsters, as they are commonly regarded, named Voltaire, Paine, Volney,—he meant to say: "We are not such people as you suppose those to be. We are not what you call godless Materialists; we are not what you fancy the disciples of Voltaire to be, or the followers of Paine; we are not people without faith, who are resolute to destroy the faith of their neighbors—as you imagine that such people are." The speaker—whose unskilfulness in the use of language the Investigator appreciates, and kindly forgives—was thinking of the way in which stupid and malignant critics are predisposed to receive him and his companions, and was deprecating any such false judgment. His point was—let me try to make it intelligible under yet another form of statement—that he and his friends were not what they (the hearers) prejudged the infidels to be—that is, were not infidels, after the sort their terror depicted. It was not his (the President's) opinion that was in question, but theirs (the cavillers'). By an ingenious, but perhaps over-subtle, device of rhetoric, the President spoke outside of his own mind, as it were, and cannot, therefore, be held accountable for the literal scope of his speech. It seems, as the Investigator says, to have been "unfortunate," but it is, at least, explicable, without compromise either of his courage, his sincerity, or his sanity of mind.

The suspicious habit that sectarianism has begotten in all of us is probably answerable for misunderstandings of this kind. The holders of opinions are all in arms against one another. They live in hostile camps, in a state of perpetual distrust. To do justice to other beliefs than our own is seldom thought of, seldom studied; to do injustice seems to be a deliberate rule. Until a new lesson can be learned; until leaders and exponents of opinion can make up their minds to take each other at the best, instead of at the worst,—there will never be any approach to truth. To wish to understand is a first requisite in all investigation.

Such misconceptions as we have been dealing with demonstrate the importance of the work the Free Religious Association has undertaken, at the same time that they make its difficulties appear almost insurmountable. If the "outcasts" tear one another to pieces by calumny and suspicion, how shall united effort against intolerance be possible? O. B. F.

Literary Notices.

PAULE MÉRÉ. Par Victor Cherbuliez. Paris: Librairie de L. Hachette & Cie. 1895.

Led thereto by a notice in the North American of Cherbuliez's last work, Meta Haldenis, we have lately been reading the one whose title we give above. In purity and vigor of style we were led to expect much, and have not been disappointed. The style is a model, even to Frenchmen, who seem born to write well as the birds to fly. The author has a way of condensing his thoughts into happy sentences, which stick in your memory, whether you will or no. In this respect, he much resembles George Eliot, from whose works it has been possible to glean quite a volume of proverbial philosophy. The story itself is very meagre, quite devoid of plot, and with hardly enough in the way of incident to furnish a story for a weekly newspaper. But the characters are so drawn as to stand out vividly, and give to the slender story all the interest of a well-acted play.

The book is a series of letters written by the hero of the story to his friend Felix. This hero, Marcel Roger, a man of thirty, with ample fortune and abundant leisure, meets, at a summer resort, in the Jura mountains, a young lady of Geneva, Paule Méré, who forms one of a party of Scotch people who are spending the summer there.

Paule Méré, the heroine, possesses great beauty, coupled with great talent as an artist, great vivacity of mind, and every charm of manner. Our hero, of course, falls speedily and desperately in love with her. In a few weeks, just as the party to which she belongs are going away, he declares his love, and they are engaged. As they part, she tells him that, when he returns to Geneva, where his mother lives, he will very probably hear evil reports concerning her, and that before they meet again he may be sorry for what he has done. She assures him, however, that she is worthy of him, and that she will, in due time, explain all. On going to visit his mother, a strict Calvinist, with bitter prejudices and a biting tongue, he hears Mdlle. Méré, surely enough, spoken of as a person of loose character, and held up as a warning to the young, by the gossips of Evangelical tea-parties. On inquiry, he can find no proof of these accusations, excepting that Mdlle. Méré had been guilty of the imprudence of making excursions into the fields sketching without a chaperone, had broken with her step-mother and grand-parents, with whom she was living, and had been adopted into the Scotch family, with whom she was then travelling. Of this Scotch family no evil was known, except that they were rationalists.

The rest of the book is taken up with the mental conflicts of M. Roger produced by this discovery. He does not doubt Paule, but he cannot forget what he has heard. When he sees her, he believes her to be an angel; when he listens to his mother, and the knot of gossips who visit at her house, he knows not what to think. The engagement is broken, and is renewed. Again it is broken, and under circumstances which prove to Paule that Roger will never fully trust her. She gives him up forever, and with her Scotch guardians leaves the country. M. Roger discovers his error, is in an agony of remorse, tries to find her, and fails. At last he discovers the party in Venice. But Paule, though loving him deeply, will not again accept him. She falls into an illness supposed to be mortal. Roger, on his part, lapses into a state of mind verging on insanity—and the book ends, leaving the reader in a state of vexation with all parties.

As a story, the book, although abounding in good things, does not satisfy, and would not reward the labor of translation.

As a good specimen of the author's style, we subjoin a passage which occurs in a dialogue between Roger and his mother.

She is dissuading him from his intended marriage, and proceeds thus:—

"Once upon a time—do you hear me?—once upon a time, there was in Brittany a little genie, called Gwyn. He was the king of the fairies, legitimate sovereign of the enchanted world. Though not three feet in height, his beauty was marvellous. From his neck hung a horn of ivory, and, when he sounded it, a man of the gravest humor could not keep himself from singing and dancing. One day, Gwyn asked a sage hermit, named Kollenn, to dine with him. Grave imprudence! but who knows everything? The good hermit distrusted the genie. 'Perhaps he is a devil,' thought he. At all events, by way of precaution, he took with him a flagon of holy water, and made his way to the fairy palace. The king of the genies was seated upon a throne of gold. Around him hovered a thousand charming apparitions, sylphs, fairies, all the winged troop of enchanted dreams. Kollenn thought himself in Paradise. 'Seat thyself at this table,' said the king; 'thou hast only to wish, and the vases of gold, and cups of diamond, which thou seest before thee empty, will be filled with ambrosia and nectar.'

"Ah!" said the sage, "I am not the dupe of thy enchantments; I see only some dry leaves." And taking his flagon of holy water, he poured it upon the table, which instantly disappeared, along with the vases, the cups, the palace, and the king. Adieu sprites! Nothing remained but a handful of dry leaves. Do you understand, Marcel?"

"None too well," I answered. "How slow is your wit! The king of the fairies, the cunning enchanter, the consummate musician who makes all hearts join the dance, Gwyn, in a word, is Love."

"The cups of diamond, the fairies, all are his enchantments. But, unhappily, near by his palace dwells an old sage of crabbed humor. They call him, I believe, Good Sense. But, you say, we need not ask him to dinner. Alas! he has a brazen face. One day he will invite himself, and then beware his holy water!" Marcel, believe me, it is best to invite him before marriage, for it is very grievous to believe in vases of gold, and then see oneself condemned forever to dry leaves." [p. 203 seq.] R. M.

IT IS THE BOUNDEN duty of every individual to serve his or her country and age in some way or other. Miss Borg and I think that we cannot do better service, at least for the time being, than to give those bent upon reading novels good novels to read, and to incite in those who denounce and deprecate novels a respect for what, after all, is the most effective form of literature. A novel is elastic and expansive enough to contain everything—the concentrated deductions of essays, the filtered value of sermons, the cogency and force of a myriad arguments, and the froth and foam of a sparkling and palatable draught. It is a portable dramatic entertainment, which one may enjoy in solitude and ponder over. It shows us more than we should ever see of ourselves, and teaches us what we would never learn in any other way. To be a good novelist requires the greatest diversity of power, the broadest scope of intellect, the most perfect pliancy of mind and faculties. When novel-writing becomes the work of persons of radical thought, enlightened views and correct ideas of how things should be, society will have its most efficient agent of reform, in fact the only one, with the exception of the stage, that it will accept; for lectures, sermons, and philosophical essays are all rejected because unattractive to the mass of people. Scolding, advice, or even reasoning, will not do; the world must have illustration; if it can be made to see that wrong is ugly and repulsive, it will shun it; if it can be shown that certain habits, opinions, modes of life have a belittling effect, it will try not to be dwarfed in the same way.

All Swedish literature is moral and elevated in its tone, and filled with ideal conceptions of character and human destiny, while the two authors that we have singled out—Madame Schwartz and Professor Z. Topelius,—write with a conscious purpose, a determination, not to display their talent, or procure fame, but to help mankind onward at least one step by holding before its eyes a bright and beautiful ideal. They are both sincere, both sound in their principles, and both endowed with more than ordinary genius and power. Both have made a mark in every country in which their works have been introduced, a mark which genius of itself fails to make, unless joined with strength of character and a worthy aim.

It has been our privilege to introduce the novels of Schwartz and Topelius in the United States, a privilege for which we have paid the inevitable price of hardship and suffering which is exacted from all who engage in any new work. What we have undergone the public will never know, for the public has seconded our efforts and always given us the good hand of fellowship. But that we have conquered our obstacles, and not been dismayed or frustrated in our efforts, may be inferred from the fact of our resuming the publication of our Swedish translations under new and favorable auspices. As can be seen from the advertisements, the Schwartz enterprise is transferred to Porter & Coates, of Philadelphia, who have just brought out the seventh novel of the series, The Son of the Organ-Grinder. With it they also publish Northern Lights, a Swedish and Finnish juvenile, composed of the finest selections in the language. Topelius, besides being a poet and historic novelist, has no equal as a writer for children. Our next work will be his historic romances entitled The Surgeon's Stories. MARIE A. BROWN.

A FARMER lost a gimlet in the woods near Monticello, Minnesota, three years ago, and the other day cut down an iron-wood tree, fast in the forks of which he found—not a gimlet, but a three-quarter inch auger! He is sorry he didn't wait a year or two longer, as a two-inch auger was just what he wanted.

A LETTER BY A VETERAN REFORMER.

LOTTSBURGH, Va., October 30, 1873.
REV. P. FISK:

Dear Sir:—I cannot tell you how cheering and timely your kind and generous contribution is, sent by Mr. Phillips. It came in our yesterday's mail. We owe you our best thanks. We are in the height of an intensely exciting political canvass, in which the hopes of our poor colored people are deeply involved; and though they are wonderfully loyal to the Republican party, they cannot escape the tricks of demagogues wholly destitute of all love of republican principles, yet anxious to use the colored vote for their own elevation to office. To baffle these designs, and save the self-respect of our colored men, Miss Putnam and I have walked miles and miles—half a score a day—under "October sun" (the poor little ex-carts are too slow to drive), and spent hours and hours—devoted oceans of talk to reason of their interest and best welfare. All this "bother" instead of direct assaults on the rebel enemy! Your cheering thought to aid and comfort us arrived in that darkest hour before dawn; for the next six hours of sore trial to our patience and faith brought us signs of victory at the polls, November 4. That is, we shall, while defeated in the vote, yet keep an advanced position in the line of our march. So we especially rejoiced in Mr. Phillips' beautiful letter and your sympathy.

What an interesting and curious scene election day here presents! our one hundred and two Lottsburgh colored voters out to a man, usually in groups just at or after sunrise, to save the day's work and to avoid rebel influence, stopping at our school-house for their ballots; or later in the day—an affecting spectacle—our octogenarian, honest Isaac Kelley, is brought up on a cart. It pauses at the school-house door for his cup of coffee, and he receives in his aged hand the precious ticket that has so exalted his manhood.

"Up! patched knee and ragged coat!
A man's a man to-day!"

(To quote from Whittier.) Lame "Uncle William Medley," too, never fails us; the only time of the year he ever hobbles down is election day. We bless the stars and stripes, and float them over the school-house in token of this benignant justice to the humblest man, while we feel the keen satire of our own disfranchisement. Our example—the fact that we are present with a controlling political influence—illustrates the supreme absurdity (to these colored and poor white men who can't read and write) of denying to us the vote. These occasions give us opportunity for many a woman's rights lecture!

Our school keeps the year round, election day and all, as we have a lady assistant teacher always with us; some one from the North, able and willing, like ourselves, to give her services. We none of us have a salary, and, connected with no organization or caste-school system, "like Hampton is," we are free to plant every liberal idea as fast as we can. I wish you could hear our scholars recite from Charles Sumner's Civil Rights speeches, and Wendell Phillips' Woman's Rights speeches, and old John Brown's glorious testimonies, as they do on all our holidays—Christmas, Emancipation Day, January 1st, 19th of April, Decoration Day, 4th of July, August 1st, Thanksgiving, and December 2d, John Brown's Day. Then all their parents, "uncles," and "aunts," and "kin," assemble in the school-house. And we think "truth flies into a heap of people's minds," as a colored boy said to me. Such "mighty" singing of patriotic songs,— as to arrest the passers-by in a wondering stop! The closing exercise is always a distributing of garments to each one present. This insures a full attendance. We are very happy in our hard work here, and believe it is good for time and eternity. We should be very much pleased to receive a visit from you, and May is a delightful month in this climate. During winter our boats stop, and we are quite isolated. Miss Putnam joins me in very warm and grateful thanks to you. SALLIE HOLLEY.

THE ATONEMENT DOGMA.

EDITOR INDEX:—

As I am one of those whose subscription dates anterior to September 1, and am accordingly entitled to an extension of time, I have this to say, that, whenever it is necessary, increase the price or reduce the size of THE INDEX as shall seem best, but keep it alive if possible.

I see some things in THE INDEX I do not endorse, and some things that I think of the utmost importance are scarcely noticed. To my mind, the doctrine of the Atonement is the biggest lion in the path of progress that we have to encounter. Besides blunting the intellect to a proper sense of right and justice, it gives the wrong-doer a chance to ease his conscience by charging it to the prompting of the devil, and getting Christ to take the responsible men are taught that they are personally responsible for their acts, both here and hereafter, with half the persistence that the clergy now teach this glaring absurdity, the supposed millennium will be begun. When we cease to muddle the brains of children with such gross violation of the principles of right and wrong, we may reasonably hope for the dawn of a brighter day. So long as men are taught to believe that they can, by prayer, by confession, or in any way, escape the consequences of their acts, so long will the world be filled with hypocrites and scoundrels.

This outrageous doctrine, so persistently enforced, has so debauched the public mind that it sees no impropriety or injustice in doubly taxing the poor man's mortgaged cottage, while the towering church, with its stained windows and gilded spire, is proudly exempt.

It seems to me that this dogma is the first and chief obstruction in the path of civilization and reform, from the fact that, though glaringly false, it is so generally accepted.

More than three score years ago, I had my head filled with the abominable stuff, in its rank and most repulsive form. It seemed to me that the Creator of the universe was an unrelenting Blue Beard, delighting in the agony of his victims. (I now believe the Creating Forces are as active as ever they were.) My creed—Those who do the least to regret here will have the least to regret hereafter. It will be very gratifying to me, and I doubt not to many others, to have some one of the able writers for THE INDEX give the atonement question a little wholesome discipline.

I hope you have but few subscribers who are unwilling to make the small sacrifice you ask, in order to recover the ground lost by the unfortunate "troubled."

HENRY SEVERANCE.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., October 5, 1873.

[There can be no doubt of the immoral tendency of the Atonement doctrine, for it destroys the protective belief that all wrong-doing is followed by natural and inevitable retribution. If humanity did not so often take the bit in its teeth, and refuse the guidance of the theological rein, it would not so often escape, by a fortunate inconsistency, the logical result of professed opinions. The Atonement doctrine, however, is merely part of a complex system of superstition which it is easier to get rid of as a whole than to abolish piecemeal. This work THE INDEX is doing according to the best of its ability.—En.]

MISSIONARIES SELLING EACH OTHER.

We have received from the Cape of Good Hope the following communication from a countryman of ours living there:—

CAPETOWN, 8 August, 1873.

To the Editor of the Gartenlaube:—

There are to be found in Germany, unfortunately, many persons who for want of exact information know of no better use to make of their money than to give it to Boards of Missions. Shillings and pennies wander off into the world, to convert the heathen, while destitution at home is forgotten. The folly of this practice is nowhere better to be seen than at Natal, where I have been living for a couple of years, not far from here. The Zulu Caffir, while he remains unconverted, possesses all the virtues which we often find wanting in white persons. He is downright honest, truth-loving, strictly moral, although he is naked, very proud of his dignity as Zulu, and of his sense of honor. So he is peaceable and of a childlike cheerfulness, and a naked Caffir can be trusted absolutely.

As soon as he is clothed, that is to say, Christianized (for his conversion does not go beyond his apparel), he generally loses all good qualities, and takes to the opposite ones. This is very well understood by the people of Natal; and, accordingly, those who are of the better sort, and who, according to conventional rule, are expected to help along the missionary work, are very careful how they take a Christianized Caffir into their service, and they uniformly prefer the so-called "raw" ones.

I am aware that the Gartenlaube does all it can for the true interior mission work, which consists in the spread of truth and light; and I would have communicated to you long ago something concerning the subject matter of this letter, if I had not desired to send you striking proofs. Without them, things the most worthy of credit will fail to be believed at home, and will be generally rejected by very many persons.

I take the liberty now to send you a Natal paper, the Natal Mercury, of 24 July, in which I would call your attention specially to the accompanying extract from Bishop Colenso's speech. I need not add anything concerning him. His reputation stands very high, not only in South Africa, but also in Europe; and, beyond all doubt, he is to be reckoned among the most judicious and enlightened of those who belong to the English Church. I would add in all justice to the missionaries, that they have certainly done themselves great credit everywhere by their philological labors. Yet this is not the only purpose for which they collect money and are sent abroad.

I hope this short contribution will be welcome to your journal.

Respectfully,

W. S.

The extract from the speech of Bishop Colenso is as follows:—

"All these missions operate but upon the outskirts of our native population. We must transfer our schools into the midst of the tribes, under the eye of the chiefs, and place them under the protection of the leading chief. The instruction should extend not only to ordinary learning, but principally to industrial arts. I fear that, if we give too much preference to the education of the head, and neglect that of the hand, we shall meet with great difficulties in providing for their support. For illustration, I will give you a short history of what took place in the neighboring region of Zanzibar, which not long since took an active part in carrying on the slave trade.

"There is there an Educational Institution under the care of the Church of England, where the young students, with much tiresome labor and urging, are advanced to the limit of their capacity. Five of them, who were thought to have had sufficient instruction to spread among their benighted brethren the light which they themselves had received, were brought over to the Mainland, to act there as missionaries. After some time elapsed, it was found, to the great alarm of the mission, that the five young men had been sold into slavery; and, on further inquiry, it turned out that the missionary education had produced such glorious fruit, that the two older catechists had sold their younger colleagues. [Great laughter.]

"Now, I believe that our schools here ought to be such as to lead our natives to be industrious and honest, to tell the truth, to treat one another with kindness and cordiality, to obey the laws, and have respect for the government; and when we have reached these results, I believe we have done more than would have been done by inculcating in them the first rudiments of Christianity. For people of such a character are in truth not far from the kingdom of God—nearer, perhaps, than those who, by their clamor and violence, disturbed the quiet of our town." (This refers to disturbances raised by the pious frequenters of a chapel, in the streets adjoining.)

"IS INTEREST-TAKING UNJUST?"

MR. ABBOT:—

A brief word in reference to your article on the above subject in THE INDEX for October 9.

It is because labor is the creator of wealth, that capital should not bear interest. It is also because labor is entitled to all the wealth it creates, that interest upon money is extortion. Furthermore, it is because money is not wealth nor a value, but simply its representative, that it should not be classified with it, nor be made to bear an analogy with transactions applicable to wealth.

Granting that "the value of the use of money is based on the fact that, when prudently used, it will bear a profit to somebody," it does not touch the question at issue. The question is—ought there to be such a fact? Neither has it anything to do with individuals, either borrower or lender, but solely with labor and capital. And here is the significance of the analogy between our system of finance and the slave system. Labor, that is, the slave, earns the wealth; and capital, that is, the master, takes it. "Provided the master justly owned the slave" might be made to read "provided money is rightly held by the capitalist." Because "the claim of the" capitalist is unjust to start with, therefore interest is unjust. "If the claim is just, interest is also just."

As to "risks" being associated with interest, the slave-master also had "risks;" but we have only to say in passing that they are only one of the many attendant evils interest-taking incurs, of which the present panic is the result.

You adduce a barrel of flour as on a par with its representative value in dollars, and then call the selling of the one and the loaning of the other a "quid pro quo." I cannot see how a "non tali pro tali" can ever become a "quid pro quo," unless you assume the current practice to justify the very thing in dispute. If the loan of a barrel of flour should not draw interest, why should its representative value in dollars? Neither in your association of dollars with values, in the case of the livery team, can I see that you affect Mr. Heberling's position. He said the loan of dollars was not analogous with the loan of horses, because horses were real wealth, while dollars were but representatives of that wealth; also that their claim for "reasonable" hire differed in that horses were consumers, while money was not. To this you reply that stable-keepers not only charge for the use of horses, but they charge "more." But what has this to do with their charging less, unless it be to cite another instance from the real practice in question as unreasonable and unjust?

You quote: "Wages, rents, and profits are the three sources of all revenue by which men pay for their living; one is as legitimate as the other." We should prefer to say that wages, rents, and profits are three forms by which wealth is at present distributed; that the one is as legitimate as the other; but that they are all illegitimate. As for wages,—the speculation by capital in men's time is not far removed from the speculation by capital in the men themselves. It is what Parker Pillsbury would call the "high art of slavery." In its place we would substitute co-operation. As for rents, whether money, horses, or houses, we would say a fair remuneration for what had been used or what was not returned as found. As for profits, instead of cost, we would sweep them away altogether, as containing the essence of financial corruption—from Bridget bartering at the country store up to the officers of government engaged in the Crédit Mobilier. From that species of profit called interest springs, directly or indirectly, all the discord between labor and capital. There is no good reason why the government should not, instead of creating a vast untaxable interest-bearing debt,—loan money to the farmer and the mechanic upon collateral security without interest.

It is because of interest that every reformatory idea has to be driven through the sluggish brain of unrequited toil, and depend for its resources upon the tight fist of capital. It is because of interest that the bread-and-butter question stares men in the face so strongly that they are turned from their ideal. It is because of interest that a thousand dollars at present can earn more than a common laborer. It is because of interest that brains can only acquire a competence, while mediocrity with money can lay up riches. It is because of interest that it is so hard to earn a living and so easy to make money. It is because of interest and capital's assumed prerogatives that Vanderbilt towers out of the Five Points with one hundred million dollars, whereas no man in the days of the Revolution could acquire one million. It is because of interest on money that four-fifths of the property in Massachusetts is owned by one-fifth of its citizens. It is because of interest that it takes three bushels of corn to bring one from Kansas to Boston. It is because of interest that the same corn can be eaten cheaper in Boston than in Kansas City, and cheaper still in London than in Boston. The cost of living everywhere is proportionate to the rates of interest.

But some one asks: "Why do you take interest, if interest is wrong?" Because it is my share of the tax upon my industry. Since the aggregate production and consumption of the country supports the aggregate capital of the country, every man pays interest. The question, then, is, shall he not recover what has thus been unjustly taken? But what if his income is greater than the added tax upon his living, as in the case of Vanderbilt's and Stewart's? Why, it should be divided among those who have no representation in the country's capital, which their labor, unrequited, goes to support.

Yours for the abolishment of unjust usages, and thus the better education of the people, for religion cannot be wholly free unless the land it stands upon, the merchandise it traffics in, and the circulating medium, be also free.

CHARLES THOMAS FOWLER.

NORTHBIDGE, MASS., Oct. 30, 1873.

[Mr. Fowler is logical, so far as he is driven to deny that "money is rightly held by the capitalists." To deny the right of interest-taking involves the denial of the right of property-owning; just as to deny the right of a tree to bear fruit is to deny its right to live at all. Wherever capital exists, it cannot help bearing interest in some form or other, however disguised. Hence the protest against interest is a protest against all property whatever. Would the condition of the laborer be improved by the destruction of all property? Just as soon as the laborer acquires property, he begins to receive its interest in some shape, and becomes a "capitalist." Our anti-interest friends do not see whether their own logic is leading them. They would extinguish all property, even as held by the community; for all property necessarily bears interest in some form, and the community would have no more right to receive it than individuals. To abolish interest is to abolish capital; to abolish capital is to reduce all men to one dead level of absolute poverty. Would that improve the laborer's condition?—En.]

POETRY AND PROSE.

Poetry by Rev. Dr. Bellows in the Liberal Christian:—

"The great toiling and hoping, loving and losing, dying and rising humanity about us has little interest in mere critical speculations and philosophical séances. It wants a church, an instituted, public, and orderly place, and ways and means of educating its religious faculties, and feeding its spiritual wants."

Prose by Rev. G. J. Mingins, of the New York City Missions, as reported in the Boston Journal:—

"He did not believe a sunny Sunday saw 200,000 people in the house of God in New York, and that is the condition of almost all New England. Either the people don't like the church or the church neglects the people." "It is said not two per cent. in London attend church, and he did not believe ten per cent. of the hard-fisted, brawny-armed, laboring men and women could be found in church of a Sabbath in New York."

THE NINTH CENSUS REPORT of Massachusetts shows the Congregationalists to be the largest of the Protestant sects in that State. They possess 500 of the 1,764 church edifices in Massachusetts, and provide sittings for 289,314 persons. Next follow the Baptists, with 286 churches, and 139,035 sittings. The Methodists come third, with 207 churches, and 117,325 sittings. The Unitarians rank fourth, with 180 churches, and 98,306 sittings. The Protestant Episcopalians follow, with 100 churches, and 46,246 sittings, and are closely pursued by the Universalists, with 97 churches, and sittings for 35,077 persons. The Catholic Church possesses 196 church edifices; and if the same method of computing members by the seat-room were followed, she would outrank the Methodists, for her churches contain 130,415 sittings. But everybody knows that in Massachusetts, as elsewhere, most of our churches, especially in the large towns and cities, where most of them are situated, contain three or four different congregations every Sunday and holiday. The two dioceses of Boston and Springfield, into which the State is divided, include some 375,000 Catholics, which makes them greatly outstrip in point of numbers any one of the Protestant sects, and nearly equal the two largest of them combined.—Catholic Review.

"I FOUND IT VERY inconvenient and a great loss of time," said Chateaubriand, "to dine before seven o'clock. My wife wanted to dine at five o'clock, and insisted upon that hour. After many arguments and many heated discussions, we finally compromised upon six o'clock—an hour which was very inconvenient to us both. This is what they call domestic concession."

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution," by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impeachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

PROSPECTUS.

Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly.

[The only paper in the world conducted absolutely upon the principles of a Free Press.]

It advocates a new government in which the people will be their own legislators, and the officials the executors of their will.

It advocates, as parts of the new government—

1. A new political system in which all persons of adult age will participate.
2. A new land system in which every individual will be entitled to the free use of a proper proportion of the land.
3. A new industrial system in which each individual will remain possessed of all his or her productions.
4. A new commercial system in which "cost," instead of "demand and supply," will determine the price of everything, and abolish the system of profit-making.
5. A new financial system in which the government will be the source, custodian, and transmitter, of all money, and in which usury will have no place.
6. A new sexual system in which mutual consent, entirely free from money or any inducement other than love, shall be the governing law, individuals being left to make their own regulations; and in which society, when the individual shall fail, shall be responsible for the proper rearing of children.
7. A new educational system in which every child born shall have the same advantages of physical, industrial, mental, and moral culture, and thus be equally prepared at maturity to enter upon active, responsible, and useful lives.

All of which will constitute the various parts of a new social order, in which all the human rights of the individual will be associated to form the harmonious organization of the peoples into the grand human family, of which every person in the world will be a member.

Criticism and objections specially invited. The WEEKLY is issued every Saturday.

Subscription price, $3 per year; $1.50 six months; or 10 cts. single copy, to be had of any Newswriter in the world, who can order it from the following General Agents:—

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

This standard Family Magazine begins its fourth volume with the January number. Its leading object is to teach the SCIENCE OF LIFE, which includes all that relates to the Art of Preserving and Recovering Health, and promoting a higher physical and mental condition of a true manhood. It will be the exponent of every means by which health may be preserved, strength of body and mind increased, life prolonged, and disease removed.

HOW TO RETAIN HEALTH.—It is better and cheaper to preserve health by obeying the LAWS OF LIFE, than to regain it when once lost. Learn to avoid the CAUSES OF DISEASE, which one can do by reading carefully THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH for 1874.

DISEASE AND ITS TREATMENT.—The true theory of disease will be considered by competent writers, and philosophical and practical methods of treatment will be given on Hygienic Principles.

Invalids should read THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH regularly, and learn the nature of their diseases, and the methods prescribed for self-treatment and cure, where this is possible, which, in a majority of cases, have been and must continue to be successful.

"Doctors' bills" can easily be saved in many families; enough to pay for ten times the subscription price of THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH every year, by simply following its plain teachings. To know how to treat any complaint satisfactorily without calling in a physician is a great gain.

HEALTH OF WOMAN.—It is a lamentable fact that many women in this country are in ill health. The wives and daughters of busy men, professional men, and even of farmers, are suffering in one way or another, and, strange as it may seem, those who should be strongest—those in the country—suffer the most. This comes not so much from overwork, as from a violation of the most simple Laws of Life and Health, which would in large measure have been avoided by following the teachings of THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

It is a Family Magazine, as every number is devoted largely to domestic interests: considering the health and needs of women, and especially the physical wants of children. It will tell with minuteness how to feed, clothe, and care for the young; that they may be strong, vigorous, and healthy.

HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT.—HEALTHFUL COOKERY.—We shall publish a series of valuable articles on "Seasonable Dishes," suitable for this Magazine. In the same ten expressly for given an amount of information, in short, brief paragraphs, always so popular and useful, worth in themselves the price of the Magazine.

Teachers are interested in THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. It will enable them to understand the laws affecting the mental and physical condition of themselves and pupils, and make teaching a delight, instead of the drudgery that so many find it now to be.

TALKS WITH CORRESPONDENTS.—This is one of the most interesting features of the Magazine. Here questions (of general interest only) are answered, from subscribers in all parts of the world; a single number containing information which it would take a whole library to convey in any other way.

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH is not the organ of any person or institution, but an independent, public teacher of the laws of life and health, and is in the interests of the people, and not an exponent of any man's practice or profession.

THE WONDERFUL NEW INVENTION.
Organ With Top Removed.

THE CABINET PIPE ORGAN,
(only perfect combination of Pipe and Reed Organ) has been placed in the market at cheaper rates, newer styles, and greatly improved actions, and as various manufacturers and dealers of the common reed organ are misrepresenting to the public the liability of the Cabinet Pipe Organ to get out of tune, we hereby guarantee the perfection of the organ, and offer our warrant that they will remain in tune equally with any reed organ, and are not affected by change in the atmosphere.

OPINIONS OF MUSICAL JUDGES.
George W. Morgan, the great organist—"An indispensable improvement over all Reed Organs."

J. E. Thomas, organist and composer—"One of the most valuable musical inventions of our time."

J. E. Buckton, organist at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Manchester, England—"In my opinion the best Cabinet Organ in the world."

Albert W. Berg, the distinguished organist and composer—"This remarkable organ I consider something entirely by itself, and something above all competition from anything now known."

Churches, Schools, Musicians, and families should not fail to examine this organ before buying anywhere, as it is a complete revolution in Cabinet Organs.

Our Oil Chromo is Entitled

"THE ARTIST COW."

In twelve colors. The picture represents an artist in the field, with paint, easel, and palette, painting a landscape. He has for a moment left his brush to chat with a pretty girl at the door of the cottage near by. Meanwhile a cow has discovered his picture, and is busily engaged in licking off the paint, while her calf has poked its nose into the artist's tools, and tumbled them all in a heap on the ground. A little back a noble bull is seen marching to the scene, attracted, no doubt, by a huge white umbrella, spread and fastened to a stake drove into the ground to keep the sun from the picture-maker while he is at his work. It should be in every farmer's library.

This oil chromo will be mounted and sent, post-paid, by mail, to every subscriber of THE HERALD OF HEALTH who sends us $2 for 1874.

GREATEST PREMIUM YET.

Or, in case our readers wish a Book Premium instead of a Picture, we will give them, when $2 are sent, THE HERALD OF HEALTH and a copy of

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE,

In one volume of 850 pages.

THE BOOK WILL BE SENT BY MAIL POST-PAID.

It is printed in new type and on good paper; contains a portrait of Shakespeare, a Sketch of his Life, and a Glossary, together with his Poems, and is the most marvellous instance of cheapness of which we have any knowledge. For $2.50 we will send THE HERALD and both premiums. CLUBBING.—We will send "Harper's Monthly," "Weekly," or "Basar," and THE HERALD, with premium, for $5.00. The same for the "Galaxy," "Atlantic," "Scribner's," "Old and New." We will send THE HERALD and "Weekly Tribune" for $3.50; "Agriculturalist" $3.00; "Our Young Folks" $1.50 with premiums. THE HERALD OF HEALTH contains, says the "Scientific American," more sensible articles than any other magazine that comes to our sanctum. $2.00 a year with premium free.

The Essence of Religion.
GOD THE IMAGE OF MAN.

Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and Only Source of Religion.

Translated from the German of LUDWIG FEUERBACH, by Professor A. Loos. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 60 cents.

To see man trembling and exulting at the sight of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to the soul. Feuerbach's Atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His Materialism was designed to prevent man's exalting in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul—yes, he did, and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve the integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that was spilled over the edge of the grave, and lost on the other side. This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected, misused, flouted, made him heart-sick.—Frothingham's Horticultural Hall Lecture, Jan. 1874.

Materialism :

ITS ANCIENT HISTORY, ITS RECENT DEVELOPMENT, ITS PRACTICAL BENEFICENCE.

By Dr. L. BURKHARDT, author of "Forces and Matter," "Man in Nature," &c., &c.
Translated from the author's manuscript by Professor A. Loos. 25 cts.

The Childhood of the World;

A SIMPLE ACCOUNT OF MAN IN EARLY TIMES.

By EDWARD CLODD, F.R.S.

12mo. Paper, 50 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

Extract from a letter from Professor Max Müller to the author:—"I read your book with great pleasure. I have no doubt it will do good, and hope you will continue your work. Nothing spoils your temper so much as having to unlearn in youth, manhood, and even old age, so many things which we were taught as children. A book like yours will prepare a far better soil in the child's mind, and I was delighted to have it read to my children."

E. B. Tylor, F.R.S., in "Nature" says:—"This genial little volume is a child's book as to shortness, cheapness, and simplicity of style, though the author reasonably hopes that older people will use it as a source of information not popularly accessible elsewhere, as to the life of Primitive Man and its relation to our own. This book, if the time has come for the public to take to it, will have a certain effect in the world. It is not a mere compilation from the authors mentioned in the preface, but takes its own grounds, and stands by and for itself. Mr. Clodd has thought out his philosophy of life, and used his best skill to bring it into the range of a child's view."

Present, and Future. A Popular Account of the results of recent scientific Research as regards the Origin, Position, and Prospects of the Human Race. Translated by W. S. Dallas, F.L.S. Cloth. 12mo. 4s.

CONTENTS: INTRODUCTION.—WHENCE DO WE COME? The Antiquity and Original State of the Human Race, and its development from a barbarous beginning.—WHAT ARE WE?—Present Position of Man in Nature, his developmental history and production from the egg cell.—Origin and Genealogy of the Human Race.—WHERE ARE WE GOING?—Future of Man and of the Human Race.—Government.—Nationalities.—Society.—Capital.—Labor and Laborers.—The Family.—Education.—Woman.—Marriage.—Morals.—Religion.—Philosophy.

APPENDIX.—Scientific Evidence, containing Notes, Explanations, and additions of the text.

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."—Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."—Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions—'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?' are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."—Scotsman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to those which it supports."—Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."—Medical Times and Gazette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and out-spoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Buechner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed minutely anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a plain and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign scientists in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."—Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Buechner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with precise and worthy neatness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."—Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against, and delivering judgment after independent investigation."—Public Opinion.

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —
Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. S.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE Political Clubs are being formed throughout the State of Massachusetts.

THERE ARE SOME three hundred and fifty churches in New York City, valued at something over forty-six millions of dollars, —all exempt from taxation, of course.

HENRY JAMES, Esq., will read an essay on Ralph Waldo Emerson, at the next meeting of the Second Radical Club, at No. 3 Tremont Place, Monday evening, Dec. 8.

THE BOSTON Journal says that "Hon. Alexander MacKenzie, the new Canadian Premier, began life as a stonemason." Did he, indeed? He must have been an uncommon baby!

"THE KING of Ashantee is allowed to have 3,333 wives, but not to exceed that number," says an exchange. Well, there must be a limit somewhere; and in this case it might just as well come on the three thousand three hundred and thirty-third as anywhere else.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT and Daniel Drew would appear to be on their "last legs," financially. Well, let them stagger. They have made many hocheater men totter under greivous burdens, and now the load which threatens to break them is one of their own making.

GEORGE B. EMERSON, writing to the Boston Daily Advertiser, says that "at least one woman from every ward of Boston should be placed upon the School Committee." Mr. Emerson is an experienced and wise educator, and his advice in this matter ought to be regarded as valuable.

"WHERE THREE sit together and discuss the divine law, there the Divinity dwelleth," says the Talmud. Even so! The place and the hour are sacred, in which two friends have held high converse on high themes. When party spirit is absent and the love of truth present, then the truth dawns with beauty and with power upon the vision.

THE Catholic Review has still some hopes of Dr. Dollinger, that, "with one foot in the grave, he may see the error of his ways and return to the true fold. May God give him grace to see the truth and to follow his better convictions." Amen to this last; but we had supposed that, so far as Dr. Dollinger had gone in opposing Romanism, he was following "his better convictions."

A CORRESPONDENT to the Catholic Review wants to know "what books he ought to read in order to strengthen his resolution of quitting the world and becoming a member of some religious community." If he could find some good work on the Art of Suicide, it might help him to carry out his design; but failing that, let him try Young's Night Thoughts, and Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy.

THE Morning Star (Baptist), in speaking of the blows which the Romish Church has received, in Germany and Mexico, queries: "After Romanism goes out, what is to come in?" Not "confidence in Christ," as the Star seems to think, or hope,—for that "goes out" with Romanism, its truest exponent,—but confidence in human nature, confidence in reason, confidence in science. A happy exchange, surely!

"AMONG the dreary mazes of secular papers which come to us tinged with infidelity," says the Church Union,

"we are glad to see some which do not fear to stand up for old-fashioned, Orthodox truth." It is indisputable that the brightest and ablest of our secular papers are, as the Church Union deplors, "tinged with infidelity;" and we should suppose that, in the eyes of that paper, the Independent and Christian Union would wear somewhat of the same hue.

REV. DR. TYNG, Sen., thus once sadly expressed himself: "What can I do with old men and women who have lived so long in sin that their skins are as hard as a turtle's shell? You can't make them feel. You might strike them with a pitchfork, and it wouldn't go through them." Though thus hopeless of its results, Dr. Tyng still long continued his preaching; but whether he ever did try the "pitchfork" experiment on any of his pachydermatous hearers, we have never heard.

THE Christian Union says: "Church members have a bad name among worldly people for small cheatings and dishonesties. Great moneyed institutions, built on the Christian profession of their managers, crumble into disgraceful ruin. Last winter's scandal in Congress touched professing Christians most nearly." And so the Union concludes that "salvation by doctrine" is not worthy of so much insistence as the living of "godly lives." This comes pretty near being good free religious teaching.

IN A LETTER from the pen of Horace Greeley, which has recently seen the light for the first time, is revealed the fact that, when a boy, he used to admire "pretty girls." There were two who were the objects of his special admiration, and whom, when he "chose sides" in spelling matches, he always selected; although, as he says, they "couldn't spell hokse, to save their souls." We confess that this little bit of sentimentalism in the gray-coated philosopher does not abate our liking of him one whit.

"A GREAT DEAL of the religious living in the world is outside living," says the Christian Union. More than this is true. A great deal of human living is outside living. All men live too much according to conventional rules and customs, not enough according to the law of their own nature, or—as Marcus Aurelius would say—according to "right reason." Let us ask, Are we in harmony with Nature—Are we at peace with ourselves? and think less of what the Church or the State requires of us. Then our living will be inside, not outside, living.

Mrs. S. H. MORSE has just completed the clay model of a bust of Theodore Parker. It gives us great pleasure to say that we regard it as a remarkably admirable piece of work. Some of the most intimate of Mr. Parker's friends experience the highest satisfaction in it, and one of them who is best qualified to judge has said to us that she considers it "perfectly wonderful" as a likeness. The face and head exhibit that great strength and dignity, and at the same time sweetness, of character, which all who knew Mr. Parker agree in attributing to him. We trust that Mr. Morse's success in disposing of copies of this bust to purchasers will be as great as that which has attended his conception and execution of it.

PROF. THEODORE CHRISTLIEB, of the University of Bonn, Prussia, read a very long and able paper before the Evangelical Alliance on the "Best Methods of Counteracting Infidelity." In that part of his address in which he treated of "Infidelity as a growing social power in Church and State," he said he would recommend "a more negative method of defence; namely, an exposure of the miserable consequences of infidelity as shown in history, in contradistinction to the wholesome effects of healthy Christian faith." This, he thought, would be "a cutting attack." Now, we are very anxious that our Christian friends should do as well as they can with their somewhat difficult case, for the only desire which we have is that the truth shall prevail; and if they have the truth we would like that they should be able to show it. But, in all kindness, we would advise them not to try this "negative method of defence." If they undertake to match man for man, character for character, fact for fact, and so to compare the moral effects of "infidelity" and Christianity, they will be overwhelmed with discomfiture. "Infidelity" could win no better vantage given it by Christianity than such a historic comparison would afford. We warn Christians, therefore, not to throw down this glove; it will be taken up with avidity, if they do.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

BY PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN.

The readers of THE INDEX are often warned that the precept of special love between Christian brethren has been antagonistic to the duty of loving men as men. It ought not to be so, but (it is complained) such is the tendency, and such the result. This is indeed but a single case of a broader proposition, a wider practical danger. Patriotism is right; yet the love of country often entails injustice to foreigners. So when special clubs arise in political emergencies, it is an ancient remark that the "brotherhood," the party, undermines patriotism, and even common justice. But this is not all. There is an egotism of the human species also, which, in devotion to the interests of man, forgets or denies the rights of whatever is not man. On this topic it is proposed now to write.

It is easy to quote from the Hebrew Scriptures texts which recommend the kind treatment of animals. They are not numerous, but they are decisive. In the Christian books nothing very definite may be found, yet inferentially the duty of gentleness and mercy to animals is contained beyond a doubt in numerous precepts and principles. Notwithstanding this, it is an undeniable fact that the oriental sarcasm which calls Christendom the "Hell of Animals" has a grievous basis of truth. Cruelties are perpetrated on the greatest scale, incessantly and through ages, and no remonstrance arises from any of the churches, as such, though now and then the indignation of individuals swells into an outcry, and some little alleviation follows. But even so, no principles of action are firmly laid down. Cruelty to a living creature is deprecated,—when gratuitous,—but no one utters the maxim that "living creatures have some rights," much less tries to define what rights. It has long appeared to me that this is among the moral defects of historical Christianity, which a rightly developed Theism ought to correct. Let the thing complained of be first clearly stated, and next let the causes be denoted, so far as possible.

We have a history of cruelty. Gladiatorial shows, in which men slaughtered men for the amusement of spectators, when suppressed, were succeeded by various substitutes in different countries, as by bull-fights in Spain. In England, we had bear-baiting, and badger-baiting, cock-fights, and other such sports, besides the mauling of man by man with the fist, a relic of antiquity which does not here concern us. These "sports" have been sustained by the zeal of a part of the English aristocracy, in alliance with a very disreputable class of the people. They are now suppressed by the police, and may seem to be extinct; but still without the enunciation of any well defined principle. Pigeon-shooting for sport remains, but has suddenly become disreputable in the course of the last year or two; inasmuch that apparently a real check has been given to the practice. There has been much writing against salmon-fishing with line and rod, against fox-hunting, and hare-hunting, indicative of a new sentiment widely spread among writers for the press. But the topic appears to be considered beneath the dignity of the pulpit: no church nor leading church-organ pronounces upon it. Laws have recently been passed to forbid fishing for salmon in unsuitable times, or modes, or killing certain sea-birds while they are breeding: but all this is in the interest of man, not in consideration of any right possessed by the animals. Shooting at wild birds and beasts is still considered, not as necessary butchery, but as gentlemanly amusement. The most frightful cruelties are incessantly inflicted on innocent animals by traps with iron teeth, and other fell devices; which continue to be legal and reputable, in spite of the execrations occasionally heard from certain quarters. Yet a voluntary society, which at first encountered ridicule, has in half a century left a distinct impress on England, and on English law, to enforce the humane treatment of animals. It is no longer ridiculed. It receives high patronage, and among its patrons no name is to be mentioned with more honor than that of Baroness Coutts. We English have made some progress, in a part of the community, towards a gentler conception of our duty towards our humblest friends and servants; but it is not easy to define how much.

Can we justly claim to have repudiated, as applied to animals, the celebrated verdict against Dred Scott? "Animals have no rights which men are bound to respect?" It may be replied, "Yes: they can claim as a right not to be subject to needless cruelty." Needless? Much turns on that word. In the cause of science (a very indefinite phrase), animals are subjected to the most exquisite tortures. Fifty years ago, the discoveries made concerning the nerves at the expense of suffering innocents threw a glare of splendor around vivisection; and it was thought legitimate to torture cats, rabbits, dogs, and horses, for the instruction of medical pupils, or to repeat and confirm a discovery. This is now disproved by some medical men, probably by many; others totally explode the defence that human welfare requires such cruelties. Eminent physicians have protested that no advantage has accrued to the art of healing from any of these horrors; but it is rare indeed for a physician to avow that they cannot be justified by the desire and hope of extending human knowledge; moreover, the practice of vivisection, with agonies which those who have witnessed them avow to be too dreadful to narrate, continues systematic, and (I fear) not much abated. Little now is talked of it: the public conscience is known to be uneasy. In sport, our middle-class youth ape the cruelties of the richest. It was in the papers, not long back, that a company of young men in Australia went out with guns for the fun of shooting large bats, which were known to live in a certain grove. The poor animals, aroused from sleep, fluttered about blinded in the daylight, and fell easy victims. The young men had the satisfaction to boast that they left on the ground more than one hundred and fifty harmless bats, dead or wounded, and lingering in agony.

Not science only, nor sport only, but cookery also claims its victims. A wholesome stir has been made in the press of late against the cruelties perpetrated on calves to make their flesh white, for the gratification of the eater's eyes, and for an increase of tenderness, probably imaginary, in consequence; it is reported that a few butchers have changed their practice. But this is only one of the atrocities ever at work against the helpless beings who are placed at our mercy. Man, says Thompson, ought to be the lord, but not the tyrant of the world.

Can we now trace the causes of this lamentable conduct? Why is Christendom worse in this matter than Turkey or India? In so far as the Eastern countries are better, it is because their religious sentiment shelters animals. A Turk (for instance) will not kill a wild creature for mere sport. He says, "God gave it life: I will not take from it what I cannot give." If the animal is dangerous, or is needed for food or clothing, he has no scruple against killing it; but even to drown a kitten, lest cats be too numerous, he disapproves. This scruple inconveniently fills Turkish towns with wild and famished cats, but not the less exhibits to us the zeal and sincere difference of Mussulman sentiment from ours. Birds, it is said, are permitted to take their share of cargoes of corn on the Nile by Mohammedan owners, who think it impious to drive them away. If this be a superstition, it is more amiable than our practice, nor must we make sure that it is a very costly sentiment. The late eccentric Charles Waterton, who would not allow a gun to be fired on his estate, and made friends of all the birds, falsified the predictions of his neighbors by the excellence of his crops. It is now recognized that birds are very serviceable to the cultivator by the destruction of grubs, and as Mohammedans do not kill small hawks and weasels any more than sparrows, these predatory species keep the balance of Nature in the fields. If man leaves the butchering to those tribes to whom it is natural,—who do it more effectually and with less cruelty than he can,—he gains in tenderness of sentiment towards the humbler creatures. Christendom seems in this matter to fall below the Eastern nations, through want of reverence for brute life. Ancient men, in civilized countries, made it a part of religion to take no animal life without recognition of God as its source. Slaughter was turned into sacrifice. Though plentiful superstition encrusted the primitive idea, a reverence for brute life was in some nations retained in connection with it.

If, leaving off to compare one religion with another, we ask, What chiefly perpetuates cruelty to animals, and hinders the attempt to fix any ideas as to their rights?—we must probably answer, The belief that their lives may at any time be taken for our small convenience. Men assume without debate, without a moment's serious thought, that brutes have no right to life, if their life interferes with our slightest whim. Not only my hunger, or danger of starvation, but the needless gratification of my palate, passes as a sufficient reason for killing a wild bird or beast. The like may be said, not only if I need the hide or the down to save me from perishing by cold, but if I covet its feathers as an ornament, or its horns or tusks for the market. Thus the principle is laid down that its life is of less importance than my emptiest pleasures, and this, even if in killing it I produce wide-spread distress to the living. Amateur butchers are clumsy; much cruelty arises from wounding without killing. Law cannot forbid cruelties in detail, if it allow indiscriminate slaughter. Hearts are hardened by custom, and thus the evil spreads.

Evil it must be called; yet to establish fixed principles that shall guide conduct rightly is no light task. Much combination of earnest minds will be wanted. The Brahmins aspired to a high morality, in refusing to take brute life at all; though in self-defence we must be in permanent war with the more powerful carnivora, and with countless tribes of insects. The first step towards a just theory seems to be, a rightful classification of animals into different grades, on which their rights must depend.

1. Animals which have feelings as sensitive as ours have a claim upon us to respect those feelings. All warm-blooded creatures at least are here included. To a philosophic slaveholder, who asks "why he may not flog a black fellow" at pleasure, it is impossible to give any valid answer, which will not equally apply against torturing a horse. Those who have equal animal sensitiveness, whether it be two men, or a man and a horse, stand here on the same footing. And as regards animal slaughter, the inference is, that if you must kill a horse (for whatever reason), or if it be a tiger, or a shark that you need to kill, you should kill him as tenderly as you would kill a man, when you believe it right to kill him; that is, you must inflict as little pain as possible. Vivisectionists coldly assume that, because a horse is worn out and no longer "worth his feed," and on that account it is resolved to kill him, it is therefore lawful to kill him with torture; such torture, as, if inflicted on a man, would rouse burning indignation in whole nations. The vivisectionist has to prove that he has any such right over another being, equally sensitive as himself. He will not attempt to establish his right by quoting anything about "cursed Canaan," and it is hard to see (the Bible failing him) what philosophy can justify him. He hopes, forsooth, "to enlarge the boundaries of science by it," and "possibly to abate future human suffering." It is well to add possibly; but this is a very inferior justification of deliberate torture.

We need not be entangled in Brahminical scruples concerning insects and animals of low organization. A sphinx moth, when its stomach was cut out, killed and devoured other insects. A crab, when its claw is wounded, kicks it off, and hops without it, until another claw has grown. Such animals have certainly so little sensitiveness that when their destruction is necessary, the mode of it is generally quite unimportant. Not so, to kill rats or pheasants by poison. Each of these practices is repobated as dangerous to man; but besides, it is cruel to the animals.

2. We have also to consider what secondary mischief we cause; as, if we wound three, in order to kill and catch one. Again, when animals have sensitive moral affections or an intelligent sense of danger, shall our philosophy justify wounding the heart of a mother by slaughter of her offspring, in order merely to gratify our palate, when we have other food in plenty? Or will it justify driving thousands from their accustomed haunts into distant and less desirable abodes, because it is our easiest mode of immediately getting blubber or tongues? These are questions for New Morals to study and solve. An English gentleman, Mr. John Smith of Malton, who has written a classical work on Fruits and Fortunes the Proper Food of Man, narrates in it what befell him as the result of a paper read before a literary society on the phenomena of sensation. It led him to inquire: "Is man justified in slaughtering animals for his food, seeing that they (or many of them) are exclusively sensible of pleasure and pain?" His reply was, that only real necessity can justify it; i.e. if the welfare of the superior and nobler life can only be maintained by the sacrifice of the lower. Further investigation convinced him that a diet which does not sacrifice animal life is even better for man than a diet on flesh or mixed with flesh. That is an inquiry involving numerous questions of fact. But moral philosophy has to deal with the principle, whether mere convenience or the pleasure of the palate, without any real necessity, gives us a right to kill creatures, organized as sensitively as ourselves, enjoying life and suffering in death.

3. The question of relation to man here opens upon us. A sportsman of kindly nature is apt to provide for the comfortable old age of a horse that has long carried him, and would be grieved to sell such an animal to a poor master for mean work and miserable treatment. Poverty may force consent; but a certain gratitude is felt for old and faithful service; still more, where there is personal affection, as in a dog. But where there is no personal relation, it would seem that our rights over animal life are increased by a certain domesticity. If by defending sheep we cause their numbers to increase, our right to take the lives which would not have existed without our care appears greater than in the case of wild animals wholly independent of us. Let this be thrown out for fuller debate. It is not expedient to prolong this paper, its object has been to excite thought on a large topic which has never yet had due attention in any system of Christian morals, or in any large Christian society.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE DOCTRINE OF NECESSITY.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

My excuse for this argument on the question of "freedom and necessity" is the belief that all valuable reforms now in progress, including the theological reform you have at heart, act upon principles wholly inconsistent with the "freedom" theory. Believing this, I cannot view discussion on the subject as a mere war of words, but as something practical and vital. I will as briefly as possible answer, as I best can, the points you make in your criticism upon my letter published in THE INDEX of March 23, 1872.

1. As to obeying the strongest motive: it seems to me fair to believe that the strongest motive is always obeyed, unless some reason is offered showing why it is not. You refer to the establishment of a universal criterion for determining the relative strength of motives. What has strength to do in the case, if the strongest does not win? How could such a criterion help to clear the subject?

2. You say: "Does our friend admit that morality commands the possible?" I admit that it commands the possible, as physical health commands obedience to the laws of health, as Nature commands obedience to her requirements generally, if we would enjoy the fruits of obedience. Not because there is any fear we may get without her law altogether. A flower is fated to blossom, in accordance with the forces within and without it. Shall we therefore withdraw from it the sunshine, and all general influences, because it is fated? Sunshine, light, and warmth, form parts of its fate; without these its fate is a wholly different one, but none the less fated in either case. So with the much more complex production, the human being; he is a thousand times more sensitive than the flower, and subject to a million-fold more influences.

3. You say: "If a man is determined to a certain course, he must follow it, right or wrong, pay or no pay." Let me ask if this is the case, provided the fact that the course pays, or that he believes it pays, constitutes the determination? If he is doing precisely that which under the circumstances he most wants to do, it is hardly fair to describe him as if dragged with a rope round his neck. This would much more fitly picture the man obeying the weaker motive.

4. You say you wish me to perceive that my theory "cuts away all conceptions, not only of moral commands, but of policy also." This I fail to perceive for the reason that the fate which shall determine our action in every instance I hold to be that which, after a long deliberation, or after the most sudden determination as the case may be, appears to us the most agreeable; no more and no less fate than this, and a part of this fate with many will be the question of policy.

Is the thing to be done politic? Now I may speculate and reconsider by the hour, and yet be in the end as fated to obey what remains, after all deductions and all criticism, the strongest motive, as if I had jumped to obedience on the first presentation of it. A billiard-ball going straight from the end of a cue seems fated to take the course it does; a bird sailing in the air seems free,—yet does their fate differ save in degree?

5. You say: "We never held that no inducements exist for doing right. But we hold that they are inducements, and not compulsions." Now this sounds, and is, very reasonable, but does not meet the necessities of the position you take in defending freedom. The question is whether, there being inducements on one side and none on the other, they do not then become compulsions,—or, there being strong inducements on one side and weak ones on the other, the strong inducements do not become compulsions? If not, in the name of reason, say why not?

6. Near the beginning of the article, you state your position on this subject to be that—"While man never acts morally in the absence of all motives, he exercises real choice in deciding which motive he will obey." Now if in exercising this choice he can obey the weaker motive, why may not a power adequate to such a feat as this perform what would seem the simpler task of acting in the absence of any motive? It is like saying—"While I cannot move at all unless some one pulls me, yet, if a child pulls me one way and a giant the other, I am quite able to obey the child, and resist the giant." And when we remember that the motives are not something outside of the man, but are in him and part of him, then disobeying the strongest motive becomes the more incomprehensible. If a man obeys the lesser motive, he practically does what he does not want to, and the reason assigned is because he is free to do what he does want to. While this would seem of itself perplexing enough, you add to it by holding him guilty of evil for the act, although conceding that at the time of its commission he may have desired to do something else more than the thing done.

7. I ask, why does he choose? The fact of freedom, supposing it to be a fact, no more explains the act of choosing than the fact of breathing does. Freedom at most is but a condition within which action may or may not take place.

8. The first of your "Fifty Affirmations" defines religion to be—"The effort of man to perfect himself." This seems to me reasonable and true, because it implies relationship between the man and his act. The better the man, the better the action, life, thought, desire, will, of the man. Yet why should this be so, if the will does not depend for its quality on the quality of the man willing? If it does, why conclude that, while the action of the will always indicates the quality of the man, yet that it, or he, might in each instance have so acted that it would contradict this quality? Such action would not only cease to be comprehensible, but would also cease to be an index of character.

9. The freedom theory claims that a certain something exists without which there would be no morals, yet this something (called freedom) is by its nature absolutely unrelated to man; and while in the departments of life many of the practical applications of the laws of his being are inconsistent with the fatalist's theory, all are inconsistent with the freedomist's theory. They are inconsistent because of this impossibility of relationship. We can but be free with what we are, not over what we are.

10. If I condemn myself, it is myself also that condemns myself in a different mood. If you ask why condemn at all, I should say, because the previous action seen in the light of the better mood is discordant, ugly, repellent, shocking; and all these and many other qualities make what we call evil. If the different mood had not come, we should never have condemned. If it had never departed, the bad act would not have been done. Yet the coming or going of the mood is not an act of the will. All wise reforms move upon the theory that you must improve man's desire, make him love the true and enduring; then action, and will, and all the rest, will fall into line. The good "Sir Galahad," when recounting those pleasures of the senses of the finer kind so dearly prized and remembered by most men, and which he had forborne, says:—

"More bounteous aspects on me beam,
More mightier transports move and thrill."

With the coming of the more bounteous aspects and mightier transports, he became the pure, saintly soul, the ideal of the poet. Yet if these full transports hold him with irresistible strength and joy to his highest conceptions of duty, what a meretricious slave he is, after all, compared with that other unnecessary saint who, with great hunger for all the lower pleasures and no counter-balancing transports at all, of his own freedom, and otherwise unaccountably, goes out into the cold, while not wanting to, in pursuit of a Holy Grail which has but slender attractions for him, compared with the warm pleasures he has left? In the latter we have both freedom and merit; in the former neither. Which is the better saint?

11. In the fourth division of your answer, you refer to the legend of Virgilinus, who slays his daughter to save her from an enforced life of shame, as giving an illustration of action inconsistent with the position taken in my letter. Now let us analyze. To Virgilinus, the daughter living an enforced life of shame, or the daughter dead by his hand, are the two alternatives presented. The terrible conflict in his mind, occasioned by the necessity for an immediate choice of the one or the other, does not interfere with, or should not confuse, the logical simplicity of the situation. Of these two terrible alternatives, does he not of necessity accept the one that seems the least terrible? If not, why not? It is certainly possible that Virgilinus may have preferred to take his daughter's life rather than have her live an enforced life of shame. All the admiration his character excites is upon this theory. If true, then, his action is, logically considered, as simple as preferring bread to a stone. What we admire is the quality of the actor, which the act indicates; yet if he did not obey the strongest motive, the act does not indicate what he is, or was, at the time, but indicates what he was not. Now in this case, and in every supposable case, all I ask is that some cause for the action be assigned. Choice is just as much action as striking or running; and if Virgilinus killed his daughter because he loved her purity more than her life, it is fair to conclude, in the absence of all testimony to the contrary, that in every act since time began a similar law has governed.

12. You say: "Whether the right will pay or not, and whether you love it or not, and whether you do it or not, the obligation to do it abides, and ought to be obeyed." In every popular sense this, I admit, is true. Yet if we ask for a reason in this matter, we must say that the "obligation abides and ought to be obeyed," because it pays; that, if it did not pay, or in other words if it is loss (not relative but absolute loss), then there is no "ought" nor obligation about it. Suppose acts of virtue should result in never-ending disappointment and misery to the actor here and hereafter, is he under a moral obligation to continue them? This is not on my theory a supposable case, but on yours I think it is.

13. I would say that virtue is virtue because of its relationship with the happiness of man, and is determined by his organization as surely as his eye gives color and his ear music. We wrongly interpret the action of our senses, and fancy that both color and sound exist independently of our organization instead of being made by it. Is not the belief giving an independent existence to right and wrong an analogous fancy? Take the words with their original meanings—right meaning straight, and wrong meaning crooked—and the analogy is perfectly sustained.

14. To be very frank on this whole matter, I concede that it is difficult to see how a first act can come in any human or divine experience, save as an expression of absolute freedom; yet equally difficult to see how it can so come. But my claim is that to neither method (neither to the free nor the caused) can you attach moral responsibility; since over the former we have no control, and the latter but indicates a condition precedent—the condition determining us, not we it. Yours, L. T. I.

DETROIT, Mich.

[1. If it be conceded that "the strongest motive is always obeyed," it follows that obedience to any given motive proves it to have been the strongest. Let us, then, suppose that A. risks his life to rescue a drowning child. The two motives, benevolence and fear, prompt to different courses,—the one to leap overboard, the other to refrain from doing it; and the fact that A. leaps overboard is, upon the hypothesis stated, conclusive proof that his benevolence was stronger than his fear. But (as men are sometimes very perplexingly inconsistent) let us suppose that on another occasion A. refrains from leaping overboard under similar circumstances: the result would, on the same hypothesis, prove that his fear was stronger than his benevolence. That is, at one time benevolence was stronger than fear in A.'s mind, while at another time fear was stronger than benevolence. Whether this particular case is or is not supposable, others will flock to mind. The fact of human "inconsistency" (that is, obedience to one of two conflicting motives at one time and to its opposite at another) is beyond dispute; and our supposition is offered simply to show that it is self-delusion to think we explain human actions by "the relative strength of motives," so long as their strength is a variable quantity,—so long as it is impossible to tell beforehand which motive is the strongest,—so long as we have to infer the relative strength of motives from the subsequent action itself. For the question between "freedom and necessity" is this: is, or is not, every human action the necessary result of a per se strongest motive? If there is no motive which is strongest per se, but, on the contrary, every known or conceivable motive varies in strength in the same mind, it is to trick oneself with mere words to say that "the strongest motive is always obeyed." To say that "the strongest motive is always obeyed," and then to say that the motive which is obeyed is the strongest, is to argue in a circle. We want our friend to say either "heads" or "tails" before the copper falls to the ground, and not wait to make his selection afterwards. What is the "strongest motive"? Name any one you please, and we will show that it is not "always obeyed" by anybody. But if the motive you name is now obeyed and now disobeyed (which is the case with every possible motive), then we submit that the phrase "strongest motive" is absolutely meaningless. The only way to give it a meaning is to show that each known motive has, at least in the same mind, a precise, unvarying, measurable strength; and then the necessarian must prove that, whenever several motives are present at once, human actions always conform to the PREVIOUSLY CALCULABLE result. Please choose "heads" or "tails" before we pitch up our copper!

2. The point of our quoted question is not apparently perceived in the second paragraph of our correspondent. We mean this: that, if morality commands anything at all, the alternatives of obedience and of disobedience are equally open. The command presupposes these equally possible alternatives; otherwise morality makes a fool of herself by commanding either what must be done or else what cannot be done. The word "ought" is without significance, if every action is the necessary result of causes.

3. If a man is "determined" to a particular course by any consideration whatever, in the necessarian sense of "determination," the results of this course are in no sense due to him as an individual. His conceptions of policy and impolicy, right and wrong, are all fated to exist, and indicate, not his own character, but the character of causes outside of and anterior to it. Necessarianism wipes out all individuality that is not purely phenomenal.

4. If a man is able "by the hour" to postpone obeying the "strongest motive," what has become of its strength? What makes it hang fire? For the time being, is not something or other stronger than this "strongest motive"? If so, what is it? Manifestly, the man himself. The concession of this ability to resist the "strongest motive" for an indefinite time, and to remain inactive under its influence, is the surrender of the necessarian theory: does not L. T. I. perceive this? The billiard-ball, instanced by him as an illustration of the human mind under the influence of motives, could just as easily fly at right angles from the end of the cue as delay an instant in obeying its impulse. The fact seems to be that the mind is not like a billiard-ball at all, but weighs motives as long as it pleases instead of being driven by them, and at last elects freely which of them to follow. If the ball cannot, while the man can, "reconsider by the hour," a difference in "kind" is so evident that no analogy can be instituted between them.

5. Our correspondent has answered his own question. Supposing that there are "strong inducements on one side and none on the other," his concession that the mind has power to "speculate and reconsider by the hour" before yielding to them proves that they are not "compulsions." In the name of reason, what is a compulsion which does not compel?

6. The "weaker motive" is as meaningless a term as the "strongest motive," unless the weakness or strength is inherent in the motive itself, independent of circumstances, and existent in a degree which is definitely, permanently, and exactly measurable. Between a "child" and a "giant" a criterion of strength can be found; one can lift (say) twenty pounds, and the other five hundred pounds; and the power they exert in pulling is in the exact ratio of twenty to five hundred. But our correspondent, while likening opposite motives to the child and the giant pulling contrary ways, forgets that he needs the terms "weakness" and "strength" without indicating any unit of force, and has therefore no right to make the comparison. We deny that there is any meaning in such terminology until some unit of force is discovered, and until the "strength" of motives is found to be a constant, not a variable, quantity. On our part, we discard such loose and misleading terms as "weak" and "strong," when speaking of motives, and substitute "higher" and "lower" instead. A high motive is one that appeals to our higher (that is, our moral or intellectual) nature; a low motive is one that appeals to our lower nature (that is, our selfishness or sensuality or other bad tendencies). This criterion of motives is the only one which is possible; and the world cannot too soon get rid of the habit of considering motives as if they were interior physical forces rather than the mere appeals of circumstance to our higher or lower nature. We do right when we obey the higher motives, and wrong when we obey the lower; and all talk of "strength" or "weakness" in the case is the abuse of an inexact and unscientific metaphor.

7. To go back of the fact of choice and demand an efficient cause for it, is simply to beg the question. The point at issue is whether any such efficient cause exists or not. If it exists, the necessarian is right,—if not, the advocate of freedom. Until this point is settled, the question—"Why does he choose?"—is not in order. The advocate of freedom can only reply that the choice is an ultimate fact, of which no explanation has been found in the sense of assigning an efficient cause. It is for the necessarian to prove that such a cause exists.

8. No intelligent upholder of the freedom-theory would contend for any absolute human freedom; he can only argue for freedom within limits. Natural constitution or organization is among them. What he denies is that natural constitution or organization acts as an efficient cause in every volition. While the general "quality of the man" produces a permanent bias towards certain lines of general activity, it seems to us untrue that it will account for the inconsistency of special actions with this permanent bias. The "action of the will" does not "always indicate the quality of the man;" it does too often "contradict this quality." So long as men frequently rise above or fall below their own general quality, the necessary theory fails to explain the problem of character, and has to take refuge in the purely physical analogies of "motives,"—that is, efficient causes of motion. Human life is too complex to be explained by physical conceptions alone.

9. It is an error to suppose that the freedom-theory postulates freedom as a "something" which "exists" in man. On the contrary, the necessity-theory postulates the existence in man of "somethings," wholly distinct from his personality, which it styles "motives;" it attributes to these "motives" the properties of independent entities,—unconscious, it is true, yet compelling actions with the irresistible power of causation. A more mechanical view of man would be impossible. In reality, motives are nothing but the man himself, affected with certain desires through the combined influences of circumstance and organization. But the man is not, or need not be, the slave of his desires. To elevate desires into "motives" which exert absolute causation over action is indeed to imagine "unrelated" entities in man that are neither part of him nor of anything else; yet the necessarian theory, attempting no explanation of them, falls to the ground at once without their support. The billiard-ball philosophy of character introduces imaginary quantities into the problem which falsify the solution.

10. The phenomenon of moral self-condemnation for wrong-doing is entirely misrepresented by our friend. Unless the self-condemnation accompanies the wrong act at the time, no remorse can subsequently arise; it is never the product of a subsequent mood comparing itself with a previous mood, but rather the synchronous protest of violated conscience. It is not a fine philosophy which reduces morality to a succession of moods. A nobler view is that of the unquenchable consciousness of an eternal obligation, perceived even when disobeyed, and therefore entailing the natural retribution of a pain born at the very instant of transgression. Is not this a truer psychological analysis, a more faithful account of the fact itself? We think every one who has experienced remorse will say so.

11. Our want of space forbids a consideration of our correspondent's illustrations. But their point is contained in his statement—"All I ask is that some cause for the action be assigned." To this we can only say that choice, on the freedom-theory, is an ultimate fact, not to be classified with necessitated effects without destroying its moral quality. If it is necessitated, it is morally no more admirable than any other effect,—the course taken by the billiard-ball, for instance. What we admire in a heroic act is the free obedience to an ideal under great pressure of temptation to disobey it; and, gladly as we would agree with our friend if we could, he seems to drop out of it precisely this admirable quality.

12. The supposition that virtue may result in "never-ending disappointment" is not in accordance with any philosophy but Schopenhauer's pessimism. But we admit that the obligation to be virtuous would still subsist. Is this admission any more damaging than our friend's, that virtue is obligatory only "because it pays"?

13. Right and wrong, it is true, are not objective entities; yet they objectively exist as truly as number or quantity exists,—that is, as relations. We cannot hold that they are "made" by our organization. Even color and sound exist objectively as vibrations which affect our subjective sensibility. As we intellectually perceive mathematical relations, so we morally perceive moral relations; and the sense of obligation accompanies the perception. But happiness, or the prospect of happiness, has nothing to do with it.

14. This closing paragraph we do not clearly understand; but we have no disposition to take advantage of the concession so frankly made. That we are not alone in our views, however, may be illustrated by what Sir John Herschel, the great astronomer, says in his Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects: "To choose the right and to avoid the wrong, as much, must be in his [man's] power, and a freedom and independence of choice as between these two grand lines of action must be left him, if we would not reduce him to a machine. So far, then, and to this extent, I do not see how it is possible not to recognize an original causation, or at least one which it is morally, intellectually, and logically impossible for us to find an antecedent for by any power of merely human inquiry."

In closing, we cannot help saying that, while L. T. I. has a theory of morals over which we hopelessly stumble, we should go nowhere sooner than to L. T. I. himself to find an illustration of the theory we believe in.—Ed.]

THE COST PRINCIPLE.

BY JOSIAH WARREN.

Round again to anarchy! The next phase in all political systems is despotism in government—the "one man power."

Is there nothing else in store for our wretched race but these two great sources of confusion and misery; or are there some unexplored regions of thought from which we can derive some hope of repose for our great bedlam mis-called "society"? Let us see. The subject of money is now up for discussion, more prominently than any other. Let us see if we understand its true function.

Although one may travel many miles in some countries, and "pay his way" with needles, silk thread, or wampum, we cannot carry flour, corn, meat, etc., about us to exchange for what we need; and therefore we carry little bits of metal, or pictured papers promising these bits of metal, called dollars and cents. There being no accepted principle for the regulation of prices, a contest arises in every transaction between exchanging parties,—the one aiming to get as much as possible, and the other to give as little as possible, of these bits of metal for the commodity exchanged; and this debasing scramble has become the most absorbing business of life.

Now (as "nothing is ever settled till it is settled right") the problem before us is, what constitutes justice; or, what would bring about adjustment? How many of these dollars should I, in justice, give for a barrel of flour? Should I give five, ten, three, twenty, or a hundred?

The flour dealers tell us that the price depends on the "demand." They have no other answer to give; and it is true to the spilt of trade throughout the world. They proceed to buy up flour to create a scarcity, and then set their prices according to the "demand" or degree of want or distress thus created; and the more distress they create, the greater are their speculations.

While this practice may give the speculator in a few hours as much as a useful man could earn in his whole life, it entirely overlooks and disregards justice to the producers of the flour. So completely is this justice left out of sight, it is not probable that there is a man in Boston who has the least idea of the average amount of labor in a barrel of flour in any part of the world.

Our question recurs: what should be the price of the barrel of flour?

As there is no ascertainable relationship between dollars and the labor in the flour, the question never can be answered in dollars; the little girl who said she "loved her father fifty cents," illustrated the futility of any attempt to pay properly for labor in any common money.

Again: what should be the price of a barrel of flour? Some have replied that an equal number of hours of labor as had been bestowed on the flour. This might hold good with some kinds of labor. But hour for hour would not apply as a rule, because some pursuits are so much more disagreeable than others: we might prefer to work three hours in one rather than one hour in another; and we cannot reach adjustment as long as there is much preference for some pursuits rather than for others. But if we adjust prices according to the pleasures and pains involved in each pursuit, giving to the most disagreeable the highest compensation, and to the most pleasurable the least, we should avert all contests arising out of preferences for positions. Each one would be filled according to the demand.

It will at once be seen that this highest reward to the most repugnant labor is exactly opposite to the prevailing customs in all countries; while it is, at the same time, in perfect harmony with the strongest instincts of every worker, and with common sense.

In the most compact phrase, it is the SACRIFICES we make for each other that should measure our compensation in order to reach adjustment. The barrel of flour, then, would be properly paid for with an amount of labor or service which cost sacrifices equal to those involved in the production and delivery of it.

To get this principle into practical working order, we take some staple article, such as wheat, corn, or iron, and ascertain by investigation the time required on an average for the production of a certain quantity in a certain locality. Corn was selected in Ohio and Indiana as this unit of measurement, and it was found to cost an hour's labor to raise twenty pounds. The corn was used, instead of dollars and cents, for the measurement of prices in the different pursuits.

The easiest and pleasantest labor was priced, perhaps, at five pounds per hour, and the more repugnant (or that attended with contingent losses) at twenty-five, thirty, or fifty pounds, or whatever each one might decide on for his own work.

This makes it necessary to find out the amount of labor in the different products; but these estimates once obtained may remain unchanged for a long time, during which time all speculations on food, clothing, fuel, etc., thus estimated, would be knocked in the head. If a barrel of flour is found to cost thirty-five hours' labor, then thirty-five hours of equivalent labor would be its price from year to year.

"But," asks our critic, "what shall prevent the holder of the flour from demanding a hundred days' labor for it?" This question introduces our "equitable money," which is simply a positive promise on INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY to deliver a barrel of flour. It would be ridiculous to say, "Flour has gone up." The note calls for a barrel of flour, and a barrel of flour must be forthcoming.

When the natural effects of this equitable limit to prices begin to be appreciated, instead of any desire to exceed these limits, the temptations, especially to men and women of high culture and moral aspirations, will be all the other way; and if one flour dealer in a city should religiously adhere to this equitable limit of price, it would be impossible for any other in that city to raise the price above that limit. The same may be said of any other department of business. One single person in a neighborhood, who would buy and sell land for an equitable compensation for his time and trouble, would put an end to the ever-vexed question of land tenures, by cutting up by the roots all monopoly in that neighborhood for the sake of selling it at a profit, and would open the way to homes for the homeless, and bread to the starving.

An unchangeable limit to the prices of our supplies would be the commencement of that "SECURITY OR CONDITION" which is the professed object of all governments, and the chief excuse for their existence.

This equitable limit of prices, abolishing all profits over and above compensation, would abolish the sharp and destructive competition between individuals and nations,—would abolish the principal cause of modern wars,—would put an end to excessive importations to the ruin of our own productive business; but at the same time it would open the way to legitimate commerce with all parts of the world where exchanges would be mutually beneficial.

Trade merely for the sake of profit would be abolished; and would be limited to the simple equitable exchange of commodities, for the same reason that the farmer and the carpenter exchange with each other—not for the profit derived from price, but for the benefits derived from each others' products, arising from the division of labor.

If the needle manufacturers of Birmingham can supply all the world with needles, and are willing to limit their prices by the costs incurred, then it would immediately become the interest of all the world to cooperate with them in affording every practical facility and improvement in the processes of manufacture that would tend to reduce the costs. But, if profit-making intervenes and buys these needles to peddle out at the highest price that can be extorted from the "demand," then there is no such motive for cooperating help—no bond of mutual interest between the parties; but instead of it an unnecessary multiplication of manufactories and a mutual strife between different countries to under-work and under-sell each other, grinding their workmen down to the starvation point. Then come the tariff systems for the "protection of labor;" and then a war against tariffs. (The first premonitory symptom of war between the South and the North was heard in 1832 in South Carolina, in opposition to the tariff insisted on by the North.) It is the buying cheap and selling dear that grinds the workers and small manufacturers to powder. With simple exchanges on the cost principle, every one bearing his own burdens, two or three hours' employment per day would abundantly furnish a handsome living and security of condition, and we could afford to be almost indifferent to the mere question of cheapness.

Perhaps it would be well to elaborate this cost principle more fully.

The words Cost, Value, Worth, and Price, are generally used indiscriminately, but here it is necessary to discriminate very carefully, to avoid infinite confusion. The word Value is here used to express the benefit or satisfaction derived by the receiver from the thing received: as, for instance, a loaf of bread may be of great value to one dying of hunger, but it might not be of much value to even the same person if he was not hungry or had an abundance.

The word Worth is synonymous with Value. Price is the thing we pay for the thing we receive.

The word Cost, like every other word, "changes its meaning as often as it refers to different things."

We say, that house cost five thousand dollars,—the word cost referring only to the money paid for the house; but, speaking of the costs of a war, the money expended is but a very small item of its costs. The sacrifices made by parents, brothers, and sisters, when families are ruptured to make up the army, the abandonment of the useful industries, the enslavement and degradation of men under tyrannical military discipline, their suffering from exposures to heat, cold, and wet, the pains of the wounded and dying, the destruction of homes, the anguish of widows, the destruction of orphans, and the lasting enmities between the contending parties, are some of the costs of a war, as that word is used when speaking of the cost principle. It is intended to express whatever is painful or repugnant in what we do or suffer—the sacrifices we may make in the services we may perform for each other. The word cost is used in this comprehensive sense, and is preferred because it is short and convenient, and not altogether new in its application.

It will be perceived that this cost-limit of price is in direct conflict with the prevailing practice of getting all we can, according to the "demand." A barrel of flour, or anything else, must have a value to the purchaser, or there is no motive to buy it; but to make this value, or the necessities of the buyer, the measure of price subjects the necessitous to enslavement for food, clothing, and shelter, or drives them to crime, suicide, or starvation, and fills the world with antagonisms and confusion. Let costs govern prices, and ruinous fluctuation in prices is at an end. Let our money be notes promising positive, definite quantities of definitely specified articles or services. Let them promise specified quantities of corn, iron, wheat, flour, coal, carpenter-work, and all kinds of services. The positive promise for certain quantities cuts off all power of the seller to take advantage of the necessities of the buyer, and puts an end to this kind of cannibalism, which will be found to be the subtle, unseen virus that has poisoned all our business intercourse. Take up any business newspaper, and there will be found an abundance of illustrations of this cannibalism. Wherever prices are touched upon, they are fixed with reference, not to any idea of justice, but to create the most "demand," and make the most out of it; and the more effectually buyers are "cornered," the more they can be made to pay. This exhibits human nature in a hideous light, and prompts us to apologize for it by the fact that it knows nothing but what it learns. All the financiers and political economists have admitted into their premises that price may properly be measured by "the demand," and all their after-reasonings are vitiated by this fatal, unexamined error; which has been admitted and followed without question as the fiat of authority. It is with this hideous dogma that the cost principle makes direct issue.

PAUL GOWER.

OF

I read, then, very attentively, not only the Scriptures, but the doctrinal parts of the Prayer-Book, and everything else that I could come at on the subject; including—when I was admitted to the British Museum Library—some of the "Infidels," whom I didn't find to be the horrible fellows they had been represented. Though they occasionally shocked and startled me, I could not help thinking they were often in the right, and on the side of truth and humanity. Always they sent me back to the Bible, with increased curiosity and less fear, aiding rather than originating the discoveries which I began daily to make in it. Looked at strictly from this new, human point of view, its discrepancies, contradictions, want of uniformity in doctrine and statement, impieties, abominations, and improbabilities—you will be horrified at this, but may find the same yourself, if you choose—seemed so self-evident that there was no gainsaying them. The Book conflicted with everything but itself—with science, history, natural laws, and the inherent convictions of God's goodness and justice, implanted by Himself within us. Not to multiply instances, which, to say but the blindly-Orthodox have become perfectly stale and threadbare—as the account of creation (demolished by geology, the revelations of which appeared infinitely grander and more in accordance with our conceptions of Deity than those of Genesis); of God's speaking with a voice (Exodus xix., 19); writing with a finger (xxi., 18); liking the smell of burnt meat (Genesis viii., 21); walking in a garden (iii., 8); showing his hinder parts (Exodus xxxii., 23); coming down to find out what men were doing, and to devise measures against them (Genesis xi., 5-7; xviii., 20, 21); encouraging fraud (Genesis xxvii., 33-37); accepting a human sacrifice (Judges xi., 30-39), and so on; of a talking serpent and donkey (Genesis iii., 1-4; Numbers xxii., 28-30); of the flood; Joshua commanding the sun to stand still (that a people fighting for their own land might be butchered)—merely to mention these. I read, also, of a cruel, partial, an unreasonable Divinity—a chosen people, who, by his order and assistance, committed horrible atrocities—of ferocious prophets and kings, who hewed men in pieces, put them under harrows of iron, made them pass through brick-kilns, murdered their own brothers and daughters, and all without ceasing to be favorites of the Almighty—of witches, ghosts, and devils—of incredible, self-contradictory and wicked miracles—all claiming implicit faith, and presented as recorded under infallible inspiration. Worse—there were filthy stories, of which I could not then fathom the meaning; only they suggested the idea of vices too frightful for contemplation. Was I going to believe in these things? In the sacredness of such a record? Clearly, if I did, it must be in spite of myself—in slavish submission to the letter, which afforded no evidence whatever of its assumed divine origin, but much against it. The various books, too, were either anonymous, or of disputed and doubtful authorship, collected nobody knew when, or how, or by whom, from a number of writings of similar pretensions, which had been as arbitrarily rejected. The Bible, then, stood wholly on its antiquity and the credence of those who accepted it—like the Koran, and Vedas, and Zend Gátras, of other nations, which we made no scruple in repudiating. There were thousands of persons, better, wiser, and more learned than I, who found no such difficulties in the volume as I did; who ignored or explained them away (very miserably, I thought); was it not the height of presumption for me to question their conclusions? ought I not, rather, to submit to them? I felt I could not do so and be satisfied.

I was desperately in earnest, remember. I had experienced what I knew to be the legitimate results of such a belief, when carried out to its logical extremity. I felt that if I tried to force it upon my conscience with all these doubts and difficulties unsettled, I should never succeed, or be at rest, or have any religion at all worth mentioning. That way everything seemed dead and hopeless. Even if I could have personally ignored all but the one fundamental article of faith to which I know you are longing to direct me—and of which I shall speak presently—that would hardly have helped me, or have lifted from me the overpowering sense of the Bible scheme being cruel, unjust, and partial—in a word, intolerable. Supposing I were saved—a large assumption, and one, I thought, demanding an intensity of belief quite above my capacity—by far the greater proportion of the human race would be cast into hell, which I couldn't reconcile myself to, or see the justice of, on any terms. I didn't credit it; I had quite got rid of it; it afforded me no further concern or anxiety. Always I returned to that point; and it made it simply impossible that I should adopt the ordinary, Orthodox views of religion, or acknowledge the vindictive, wrathful, Jewish God of the Bible.

At the same time, I felt that in renouncing both I was freer, and better, and happier. I had got into healthier relations, both with the Book and my fellow-creatures. Before I searched for myself (and if you deny my right, I commend to your consideration these texts: "Refuse profane and old wives' fables;" "Not giving heed to Jewish fables;" and "All uncleanness let it not be named among you:") I had, like others, but a barren belief in the letter, thinking that all the events spoken of occurred in an exceptional time and manner, outside the scope of vital human interest: now, waiving the supernatural claims of the volume, it assumed an unexpected value. I could recognize in it matter of the highest importance, the grandest and most beautiful truths, the sublimest poetry—all more or less involved with error. It seemed to recall the infancy of the world, in its first freshness, ever glorified by the presence of God. Especially I liked the book of Job, the Psalms, and the Prophecies: imperfectly I began to comprehend something of the individuality of the various writers; but the further I went, the more convinced I was that they were distinctly human—they and their belongings. There was religion, and fatalism, exaltation, epicureanism, and despondency, piety, patriotism, and rage; the loftiest conceptions of God's omnipotence and majesty alternating with assertions concerning, and prayers to, Him which I wondered people could bear to hear read in Christian churches: nearly everything had its alloy; nothing could be admitted without discrimination, but a great deal cheered, consoled, elevated. At the "Rooms," as they were called, to which we occasionally went on Sundays, they read the Church Service; I used to follow it as far as I dared, breaking off in the responses when they went against my conscience, and always maintaining a running mental commentary on what was transpiring. The Athanasian Creed filled me with disgust and contempt: the sermon was generally productive of mere weariness. I wanted to tell people what I had discovered. And, naturally, I felt kinder towards every living soul, now that I knew we were not to be shipwrecked everlastingly.

You will have observed that I have hitherto spoken almost exclusively of the Old Testament: I now came to consider the New, which had always appeared different to me—nothing like so formidable. There was one central figure which brightened it immeasurably—which irresistibly attracted me—whom I longed to believe in with all my heart. Somehow I didn't seem to fear him, or to identify him or his teachings with the cruel Jehovah of the older books. The texts in accordance with them on what I had discarded made little impression on me; neither did I, at first, think much about the question of the inspiration of the apostolic writers, or of his divinity. I suppose I took the latter for granted; but it was the human side of his character which penetrated me with love and reverence, and, for a time, thrust all these considerations into the background. That was so real, so distinct, that it dwarfed the surroundings into comparative insignificance. His announcement of God's paternity and care for us, his pure and unselfish faith, summing up all the law and the gospels in love to God and man, above all his surpassing goodness, were what I found nowhere else—unique, and altogether beautiful. These involved no contradictions or absurdities, no violations of what God himself had implanted in the soul in order to enable us to choose between right and wrong, good and evil: they were radical, absolute, and instinctive. I found evidence of them in my own heart and conscience; in their suitability to all conditions of mankind; in my accepting them as freely as the song of a bird or the voice of a dear friend. Not a seeker for truth through all the ages but would have done so; such doctrines were of yesterday, to-day, and forever. I began to understand something of their importance, and resolved, come what would, to hold on to them—to make them the foundation of my religion, if I ever attained to one. I did not know then that they comprised all religion, being "all that is required of us, either to do or to foresee."

THE "DANBURY MAN'S" last is: "The churches were well filled Sunday. The shape is an improvement, but the trimming is not wholly satisfactory. They set a little farther back on the head than the summer styles, we think."

THE GENTLEMAN who asserted that his friend never opened his mouth without putting his foot in it, being called upon to apologize, said he was very sorry; but when he made the assertion he did not see the size of his friend's foot.

Poetry.

SONG OF THE HINDU DEVOTE.

TRANSLATED BY MR. BAYERS, AN ENGLISH MISSIONARY.

The snow-flake that glances at noon on Kallasa, Dissolved by the sunbeams, descends to the plain;
Then, mingling with Gunga, it flows to the ocean,
And, lost in its waters, returns not again.

On the rose-leaf at morning, bright glistens the dew-drop
That in vapor exhaled falls in nourishing rain;
Then in rills back to Gunga through green fields meanders,
Till onward it flows to the ocean again.

A snow-flake still whitens the peak of Kallasa,
But the snow-flake of yesterday flows to the main;
At dawning, a dew-drop still hangs on the rose-leaf,
But the dew-drop of yesterday comes not again.

The soul that is freed from the bondage of Nature Escapes from illusions of joy and of pain;
And, pure as the flame that is lost in the sunbeam,
Ascends unto God, and returns not again.

It comes not, it goes not—it comes not again.

SUNDAY LECTURES.—The Editors of THE INDEX will lecture occasionally on Sundays, if desired, within a convenient distance of Boston.

PREMIUM OFFER.

To EVERY Subscriber, new or old, who shall send us $3.00 at any time between now and New Year, THE INDEX shall be sent until January 1, 1875.

CASH PREMIUMS FOR 1874.

In order to increase the circulation of THE INDEX, and thereby make it a more powerful instrumentality in the reform to which it is devoted, the following Cash Premiums are now offered:—

1. THE INDEX will pay to any one of its old subscribers $1.00 for every new subscription of $3.00 obtained by his or her means and forwarded to this office. If preferred, the $1.00 may be deducted before remitting. This offer holds good for new subscriptions alone, and not for renewals.

2. In addition to this, it offers One Hundred Dollars to the person who shall send the largest list of new subscribers, with the money, before the first day of February, 1874, and Fifty Dollars to the person sending the next largest list during the same time.

There are many warm friends of THE INDEX throughout the country who would be glad to help increase its circulation, if they could only afford to give their time to the work. The above offers will enable them to do so. Supposing that the largest list sent contains one hundred new names, the sender will be entitled to $100.00 as commission and another $100.00 as premium. Will not many of our lady subscribers, who are the most efficient of all canvassers, seize this opportunity to help THE INDEX without too great a sacrifice on their own part?

GLIMPSSES.

MR. HORACE SEAYER, editor of the Investigator, has our hearty thanks for his generous coöperation in securing signatures to the "Anti-Exemption Petition."

MR. PARKER PILLSBURY, as will be seen by a cordial letter from him on another page, is faithfully at his post in Salem, Ohio, where he has spent several winters, and has the warmest friends. His long and self-sacrificing service in the old anti-slavery cause is continued in the new anti-slavery cause of Free Religion.

WE HAVE had prepared a number of handsome placards, printed with colored inks on thick Bristol boards, for gratuitous distribution to such News-Dealers as are willing to hang them up conspicuously in their stands. Please ask your own news-dealer whether he will hang one up near his counter, if sent. We shall be happy to forward it to his address. This little service, which will cost our friends very little trouble to render, may be of great value to THE INDEX.

A GOOD JOKE ought to be appreciated, and the Independent does itself credit in the following:—

"Says THE INDEX:

"What is the difference? The Radicals believe in the 'Perfect Man,' the Orthodox believe in the 'Perfect Horse.'"

"Who is that 'Perfect Man' that the Radicals believe in? We supposed it was only the Orthodox who believed in Him. Is it not more accurate to say that the Radicals believe in the perfect race? If so, the difference would seem to be that, while the Orthodox have no objection to a perfect horse, they are generally opposed to races."

WE FIND in Nature, for November 6, an account of a recent discovery of a human bone in the Victoria Cave, near Settle, Yorkshire, belonging to an age previous to the great ice-sheet of the Irish Sea basin,—that is, to inter-glacial, if not pre-glacial, times. Mr. Buak, after long deliberation, has pronounced the bone to be human; and his verdict is that of an ac-knowledgeable expert. He says: "The bone is, I have now no doubt, human,—a portion of an unusually clumsy fibula, and in that respect not unlike the same bone in the Mentone skeleton." Thus the evidence of the vast antiquity of man is strengthened by new discoveries day by day; and the Mosaic cosmogony has already taken its place among other well-recognized myths.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD, the well-known Liberal lecturer, has kindly offered to act as agent for THE INDEX; and the public is hereby informed that he is authorized to receive subscriptions for it wherever he goes. Mr. Underwood favored us with a call lately, and, expressing great interest in the Liberal League movement and the object it seeks to accomplish, promised to use his influence to form Leagues in all places where he lectures. We anticipate important results from his exertions, as there is no more successful or popular lecturer in the field in behalf of Liberalism. He is in favor of combining all Liberals, of whatever shade of opinion on religious subjects, in the energetic prosecution of their common ends; and we congratulate all friends of the movement on so valuable an acquisition.

WHAT A TREASURE-HOUSE of noble thoughts is Carlyle's Sartor Resartus! "Of this latter sort are all true Works of Art: in them (if thou know a Work of Art from a Daub of Artifice) wilt thou discern Eternity looking through Time, the God-like rendered visible. Here too may an extrinsic value gradually superadd itself: thus certain Rhads, and the like, have in three thousand years attained quite new significance. But nobler than all in this kind are the Lives of heroic, god-inspired Men; for what other Work of Art is so divine? In Death too, in the Death of the Just, as the last perfection of a Work of Art, may we not discern symbolic meaning? In that divinely transfigured Sleep, as of Victory, resting over the beloved face which now knows thee no more, read (if thou canst for tears) the confluence of Time with Eternity, and some gleam of the latter peering through."

THE MEETING of the Boston Liberal League at Parker Fraternity Hall, December 5, was very well attended, the hall being more than two-thirds filled. Speeches were made by Horace Seaver, Dr. H. B. Storer, B. F. Underwood, Dr. H. F. Gardner, S. H. Morse, and others; and numerous names were added to the League's list of members, which now numbers about one hundred and sixty. Vigorous efforts will be made this winter for the abolition of church-exemption, both in this State and in the District of Columbia. The "Anti-Exemption Petition" addressed to Congress received a great many signatures; a similar one addressed to the Massachusetts Legislature was voted by the League, and was also numerously signed. We were highly gratified to see how cordially Materialists, Spiritualists, Theists, and so forth, united to press the "Demands of Liberalism." The reader will find an interesting report of this meeting in another column.

THE ARTICLE on the "Cost Principle," on a previous page, was written for THE INDEX by Mr. Josiah Warren, of Charlestown, Massachusetts, to whom John Stuart Mill refers in his just published Autobiography [page 256] as "a remarkable American," who "had formed a System of Society on the foundation of the 'Sovereignty of the Individual,' and had actually commenced the formation of a Village Community (whether it now exists I know not), which, though bearing a superficial resemblance to some of the projects of Socialists, is diametrically opposite to them in principle, since it recognizes no authority whatever in society over the individual, except to enforce equal freedom of development for all individualities." Mr. Mill further says that, in his world-renowned Essay on Liberty, he "borrowed from the Warrenites their phrase, the sovereignty of the individual." Mr. Warren, now in feeble health and advanced years, is the author of a little work of less than one hundred and twenty pages, entitled True Civilization, which is one of the most remarkable treatises on social science ever produced,—certainly original, powerful, and instructive, if not altogether adequate to its noble object. We recently had the pleasure of spending an evening with Mr. Warren, in company with a little knot of his enthusiastic disciples; and at some future time we shall probably have something to say in THE INDEX concerning his theory, when we have given it sufficient study to justify criticism. Meanwhile we commend his article, probably to be followed from time to time by others, to the close attention of all who are interested in the equitable adjustment of economical and social relationships.

A CARD.

Below is the form of a petition to be presented to the Legislature of Massachusetts the coming session, asking the repeal of the laws whereby church and other property is now exempted from taxation.

The BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE desires the signature of every voter and tax-payer in the Commonwealth to this petition, who wishes these unjust laws repealed.

It being important, however, that the petitions be presented at an early date, prompt action is required; we therefore call upon the friends of the movement in the different cities and towns of the State, who are willing to see that their ward, town, or neighborhood, as the case may be, is immediately canvassed for signatures, to send us his or her name at once; and the proper blanks, with any other assistance which lies in our power, will be cheerfully furnished.

Members-elect of the Legislature, who intend to sustain the measure, will confer a favor and assist the movement by sending us their names.

We would also say that copies of this petition, as well as of a like petition for the repeal of the same class of laws in the District of Columbia, may be obtained at THE INDEX Office.

A PETITION

FOR JUST AND EQUAL TAXATION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in General Court Assembled:—

We, the undersigned, voters and tax-payers of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, respectfully represent:—

1. That under the laws of this Commonwealth persons can readily incorporate themselves into so-called Religious, Educational, Scientific, Literary, Benevolent, and Charitable associations, and as such hold large amounts of property exempt from taxation.

2. That the exemption of such associations from taxation is practically taxation of the rest of the community for their support; which is to increase unduly and unjustly the taxes of all other property-holders.

3. That this exemption from taxation has come to be so large and valuable a gratuity, that many such corporations are formed unnecessarily, for the purpose of holding property untaxed until such time as the corporation shall wish to divide the same.

4. That this exemption in the case of religious societies, instead of promoting the interests of pure religion, or subserving any public end, stimulates the various sects to multiply such incorporations unnecessarily, solely for the purpose of competing more successfully with each other by increasing sectarian wealth and power.

5. That no State support to such corporations should be given either directly or indirectly; but that, if given at all, it should be given by direct appropriation, to the end that the people may know the amounts, and to what uses the public money is really put.

6. That the exemption complained of is frequently used to cover large amounts of property which are not intended to be legally exempt,—thus increasing the taxes of the poor for the benefit of the rich.

7. And that therefore your petitioners pray that the third, seventh, and ninth clauses of section five of chapter eleven of the General Statutes—being those parts of the Statutes which provide for the aforesaid objectionable exemption—together with all special acts of like purport, be repealed.

NOTE.—Ladies signing this petition will please write under the head of "Remarks" not a voter. If also a tax-payer, write taxed.

INTELLECT AND SYMPATHY IN RADICALISM.

With characteristic gentleness, Mr. Gannett examines in another column the opinions expressed in our late article on "Two Views of Free Religion." Inasmuch as we depicted the "sympathetic view" as partial and non-inclusive of the "intellectual view," while the latter was represented as comprehensive, embracing substantially the other also, he considers our treatment of the subject "one-sided," and unintentionally unjust.

This criticism, if merited, would indicate a grave defect vitiating the whole article in question. Perhaps it would indeed have been better to state (what is certainly true) that it is possible to look at Free Religion in a narrowly intellectual light, to the neglect of its sympathetic side; and that this form of partiality is as mischievous as the other. But such a view would be imperfect intellectually as well as sympathetically. The only thoroughly intellectual view must be worthy of the intellect, that is, comprehensive,—doing justice to sentiment and aspiration as well as to thought and truth. It was our purpose to point out, on the one hand, that the excess of sympathy which disinclines one to the necessary work of directly exposing error in every legitimate way, whether by sarcasm or logic or any other well-recognized means, and which creates a repugnance to the energetic agitation of measures of practical reform, tends to paralyze the efforts of Free Religion to ameliorate the condition of the world, and to frustrate to some extent the practical advancement of its own cause. It was equally our purpose to point out, on the other hand, that a broadly intellectual view of Free Religion not only does ample justice to its sympathetic side, and abundantly appreciates its sweetness, geniality, and reverential spirit, but also comprehends the necessity of dissipating error by every possible means of illumination,—of arguing, persuading, or ridiculing dogma out of existence,—and of boldly seeking to secure such political and social reforms as shall deprive dogma of a power over the human mind to which it has no title but that of flagrant usurpation. It will thus be seen that what Mr. Gannett considers "an empty corner of the sketch" was not an omission; that on the contrary we intended to contrast the excess of sympathy with that true intellectualism which justly values sympathy in the highest degree, yet sees the necessity of making its universal existence possible by abolishing the causes which now render its opposite everywhere prevalent. In a word, we meant to depict the "sympathetic view" as partial and the "intellectual view" as comprehensive, because no view which failed to do entire justice to sympathy would be entitled to the high praise of being really "intellectual." The intellectual view cannot "too much prevail;" for the more it prevails, the more it will correct the semi-intellectualism which despises sympathy and genuine sentiment, and thereby proves itself incompetent to understand human nature on all its many sides.

Now Mr. Gannett has a very profound and beautiful appreciation of the sympathetic side of Free Religion. He is a teacher to us all in this respect, and we acknowledge with equal gratitude and gladness our own indebtedness to him for the influence he exerts on all who come within its reach. Nor is this all. There is no braver or truer knight in the new chivalry of thought,—none who more utterly ignores the temptations of policy in the avowal of his convictions, or who is more incapable of insinuating them under the mask of old phrases out of which the old meanings have died. If he withholds his approval to some extent from the method of work which we act upon in THE INDEX,—if he thinks that "the perpetual military insistence on special points almost inevitably produces the bigot's disproportion" (though we should certainly claim that what we "insist" on are not so much "special points" as special applications of universal principles),—no one could be less desirous than we that he should either try to cooperate with us in these respects or withhold from them his most explicit and public disapproval. On the contrary, we court criticism and open rebuke when we are thought to go wrong; and whoever thinks we go wrong has a right, nay, a duty, to seek to counteract the evil where it is most likely to do harm—in the pages of THE INDEX. Hence we have only cordial acknowledgments to return for such articles as Mr. Gannett's.

In defence, however, of the "intellectual view" of Free Religion, taken in the comprehensive sense we intended rather than the partial sense in which Mr. Gannett misunderstands it, we should plead the necessity of no longer allowing an excess of sympathy to paralyze the practical efficiency of religious radicalism. It is too true that the public influence of religious radicalism, especially in New England, is altogether disproportioned to the mental, moral, and spiritual power it embodies. Instead of revolutionizing the thought of the times, and making itself felt from the Atlantic to the Pacific, it remains, after three or four decades of "self-conscious existence, merely the "peculiar views," the private ism, of a clique. Learning, scholarship, culture, refinement, genius, purity, exceptional beauty of character, have not availed to affect to any great degree the religious belief of the American people. The radicals hold brilliant soirées in private parlors; they make little or no impression on public opinion. They are not, as they are justly entitled to be, the brain of religion in America, originating the impulses which dominate the religious development of the country. Such religious progress as is made results far more from the writings of the representative men of modern science, who are growing daily more bold and outspoken in their strictures upon the prevailing faith, than from those of the radicals themselves. Why? Because the people want instruction, information, knowledge,—plain speech on religious subjects, vigorous exposure of the absurdities which make the staple of pulpit gossiping, direct application of scientific principles, facts, and discoveries, to religious thinking. We venture to say that the Free Religious Association, by a few itinerant conventions (which in the West three years ago earned for it the euphonious soubriquet of "hell on wheels"), has done more to affect the popular mind than all the other activities of the radicals combined. So weak inherently is the doctrinal framework of Christianity, when tested by the truths of modern thought, that it could not long survive the ordeal of universal public discussion; it would inevitably give place to truer views of human life, duty, and destiny. Yet the radicals, who are best fitted to discharge the function of popular enlightenment, have not risen to the height of the occasion: their light is hidden under a bushel. The religious influence of the churches is still vast, their following immense, their supremacy indisputable; and the far superior religious influence of radicalism is scarcely felt at all by the public at large.

Now we do not say this at all in the spirit of blame or censure: we are simply noting a fact. Our own view of the scope, function, and opportunity of radicalism in the religious development of the country determines the view we take of the real utility of a paper such as THE INDEX; and to this point we are now speaking. What is the situation?

1. The influence of the churches over public opinion is vast, despite the fact that their creeds are growing more and more brittle as time goes on. It is not only vast, but unnaturally vast,—that is, immensely disproportioned to the real hold which the creeds have on the public mind. This great surplussage of influence over and above that of the creeds is due to the social and political status of the church, and would be lost if that status were greatly changed.

2. The various points specified in the "Demands of Liberalism" indicate the secret source of this surplussage of influence. The present semi-establishment of Christianity as the national religion, maintained by exemption of church property from taxation, by the legally authorized reading of the Bible in the public schools as an act of Protestant Christian worship, by Sunday laws, by the judicial oath, by governmental proclamation of religious fasts and festivals, and so forth, invests the Church with a quasi-national authority and dignity which exerts enormous power over the average American mind. It intimidates a people so sensitive to public opinion as the Americans are. It prevents their looking at Christianity straight in the face. It closes their minds by the spell of popularity and fashion and social prestige. In short, the political support given to the Church by the State, while seemingly slight, is immense in fact; it invests the former with the majesty of the latter, and, all the more because not obtruded on public attention, stands to-day as the chief obstacle to the universal spread of radical thought.

3. It is the first duty of radicalism, in our opinion, to abolish this great political evil of State patronage of the Church. If the radicals were fully alive to their own public function and opportunity, and to the strenuous exigencies of the time,—if they realized their own profound obligation to the country to render the service now most urgently needed for the perfection and purification of the American idea in the public mind,—they would rally to a man, and throw themselves into the work of organizing Liberal Leagues with a hearty and contagious enthusiasm. But they do not do it. They wait for the people to start such movements spontaneously. They do not heartily believe in such agitation—perhaps think it ill-timed, demoralizing to the individual, and injurious to the cause of radicalism itself. Not detecting the wide ramifications of the evil we have pointed out, which are not obvious to the careless eye, they hold aloof, and lose the mighty influence they would achieve if they united to demand, at once and with vigor, a Republic emancipated from the Church.

4. The reason why the radicals thus leave undone the especial task of radicalism, and consequently fail to make any deep impression on the religious development of the country, is to be found, we believe, in an excess of the sympathetic tendency. The grim fact that Christianity and Free Religion are at deadly variance, cannot be reconciled, and are slowly approaching that battle-field where all great contests in America are at last fought out—the arena of politics,—is repulsive to their sympathies; and these blind their intellectual perceptions. Antagonism is an unwelcome thought; it implies unwelcome things. But he who announces a painful fact does not create it. Neither does antagonism bring evil alone. Universal agitation of the political reforms specified in the "Demands of Liberalism" would in five years do more towards diffusing radical thoughts, ideas, and aspirations throughout this nation than all the utterances of all the radicals for a hundred years—including THE INDEX itself. Such agitation will make the nation educate itself in radical principles. There is no education so good as that; and the sympathy which stands in the way of it will not, in the long run, do a tithe as much for the sweetness, gentleness, goodwill, and tender religiousness which Mr. Gannett has so much at heart, as will the seemingly sterner and harsher method which we adopt. Through the conflict we look beyond; and, while we should count it mawkishness to feel obliged to dish up every hard fact with affectionate expressions, or to "truth-it-in-love" in every paragraph, we yet sincerely believe that we have a better and more humane motive at bottom than any "battle-joy."

5. Hoping, then, to make these pages rich with many such thoughts and sentiments as beautify all that Mr. Gannett writes, and not neglecting the warm heart of sympathy and fellowship in all that is noble, pure, and elevating, we yet accept the task laid upon us by our conception of the real duty of radicalism to-day. We hope to make THE INDEX a powerful agency in freeing the State totally from the Church, doing yeoman's service in the abolition of all ecclesiastical privileges, and thereby gaining a fair field for Error and Truth to fight it out in the public mind. In this great work we wish deeply to have the aid of all radicals; but the work has got to be done, will sooner or later rally an army out of the very stones we tread on, and must go on to a glorious end, fall who may to the rear or on the field. If the wise and learned scorn the task, then the common people shall take it up; and whoever takes it up, by his side we stand.

LIBERTY FIRST.

I forget what sectarian publication had some such fling as this at the Free Religious Association, the other day: "The Free Religionists are always talking about freedom of thought. Now that they have obtained it, why do they not use it, and do some thinking?"

Such an attack would seem hardly worth answering, for an Association which includes among its Vice-Presidents Emerson and Garrison, Curtis and Youmans. But I cannot part with the criticism so easily, since it suggests a point of no small importance. This mode of argument is indeed precisely parallel with that other common complaint of our opponents,—that we do not spend money as freely as they do. The answer in both cases is the same: We do not give our time to works of pure thought, for the same reason that we do not give it to making money—because the service of freedom comes first, and we cannot get excused from that. For us, "there is no discharge in that war." No conscript was ever more ready to lay aside his uniform, on his discharge, than we shall be when our term of service as radicals expires. Then we will be great thinkers and write great books, or great money-makers and get up costly conventions. Meanwhile, we must stick to our work.

"In youth," says Goethe, "we expect to build palaces for men. As we grow older, we find that we have as much as we can do in clearing away the dust and rubbish left by others. The work requires resignation, but it must be done."

But it will be asked: "Why this perpetual talk about freedom? Are you not free?" Individually we have made ourselves so. But at what cost of resolution, of time, of money, of friends—and our critics say, even of temper—is best known to ourselves. It is our desire that our children, and the children of our critics, shall not have to pay so high a price for their freedom. These clergymen who come to us and tell their pitiful tale,—how they dare not speak what they know, lest their wives and children starve in consequence; these young college-tutors who come to us and say, "If we join the church, it is a lie; if we refuse to join it, our career as scientific instructors is at an end,"—it is for these we labor. We would rather let all the work go, did not conscience compel; it would be far pleasanter to pass into "the still air of delightful studies;" Mr. Abbot would much rather go back to the metaphysical researches which first won him fame in the North American Review; merely intellectual labor would be happiness for all of us, did not moral service first constrain. Liberty first; first freedom to think, then thought.

I know a young woman of high character, excellent attainments, and intelligent though not radical opinions. She was a teacher in a large school, professedly unsectarian. The school was visited by a well-known lay-revivalist. At a prayer-meeting, this preacher gave his definition of Christianity, and invited all who could call themselves Christians, on that basis, to rise. Many rose. He then asked all who wished to be Christians, on that basis, to rise. Every one in the room rose, except this teacher. It cost her a struggle to keep her seat; but truth constrained her. She honestly wished to be a Christian, but not as the revivalist had defined the word. She knew that she was alone in her refusal; she knew the risk involved. It would probably cost her place in the school; and she thought of the invalid father, himself a retired clergyman, who was dependent on her salary. Yet she kept her seat; and for this act of brave fidelity, on which angels might have looked with loving admiration, she was dropped from the list of teachers in that school. While such things are possible, the war for free thought must continue. May we, who have enlisted for it, not turn back! It was Whittier who wrote, on his sixty-fourth birthday:—

"Better than self-indulgent years
The outflung heart of youth,—
Than pleasant songs in idle ears
The tumult of the truth."

T. W. H.

MEETING OF THE BOSTON LIBERAL LEAGUE.

SPECIALLY REPORTED FOR THE INDEX.

The Boston Liberal League met at the Parker Fraternity Rooms on Friday evening, December 5. The attendance was large, and the discussion upon the question of church taxation was animated, and much to the point. Petitions to the State Legislature and the National Congress were circulated, and received many signatures. This League is about to issue a tract on "Equal Taxation and No Exemption," prepared by Mr. Abbot. During the evening a considerable sum was subscribed, that the tract might have an extensive circulation. F. W. Clarke having resigned as a member of the Executive Committee, F. E. Abbot was elected to fill the vacancy.

Mr. F. E. Abbot opened the discussion, by referring to the work of the League. He approved of its plan to take up one measure at a time, making vigorous efforts in its behalf until the object proposed was accomplished. The League had wisely chosen to press upon public attention first the justice of taxing church property. By its non-taxation, the State compelled all citizens to contribute to the support of a system of theology which many of them believed to be utterly pernicious. It was not true that the churches were in any important sense the conservators of public morals. They dealt not with morality, but with theology. The Christian system sets morality aside as relatively of no account. It ministered not to the necessities of this world, but preached a scheme of salvation for souls in a world to come. He had heard a distinguished revivalist declare that "a moral man out of Christ could not be saved."

When, therefore, it is claimed that the exemption of church property saves the expense of police courts, we have only to refer to the facts as they are furnished by Christian churches to refute the assertion. The only effect is to build up the different denominations, to make them more powerful and able to spread their peculiar religious dogmas. Mr. Abbot spoke of the great amount of property thus exempted, there being over six millions in the city of Boston alone. What we want is simple justice, that taxation shall be for the public benefit, and not for private sectarian ends. We demand the entire separation of Church and State.

Horace Seaver spoke briefly in favor of the petitions. He hoped that they would be widely circulated, and that all Free Religionists, Spiritualists, Infidels, and liberals of every shade of opinion would sign them. The liberals under the lead of Mr. Abbot had sent to Congress a petition against the proposed religious amendment of the Constitution, signed by about one hundred thousand names in all. The good work should be continued, and no effort spared to secure the absolute secularization of the State.

There is no reason in the world why a church should not be taxed as much as a museum, a theatre, or a railroad corporation. The press is taxed. And what is the Church compared with the printing press? We could easily get along without churches. But who could get along without your weekly and daily journals? There has been great progress in religious emancipation. Fifty years ago in this State religion was openly and directly supported by law. But much remained to be done. Liberals must keep awake, and keep up the struggle. If they put forth half the energy the Christians show, the liberal battle might be won at once. Why should they not be up and doing?

Dr. H. F. Gardner did not wish to make a speech, but would state a fact. He had tried to get a Spiritualist society incorporated with the right to hold property exempted from taxation to an amount equal to that of the Tremont Temple Baptist Society, but failed. He mentioned this to show the bias of government in favor of the Orthodox faith.

Dr. H. B. Storer, being called on, spoke for a few minutes warmly advocating the Liberal League, hoping that it would push forward its work, and secure the repeal of all unjust and unequal laws. We ask only for fair play.

Moses Hull spoke, earnestly calling upon liberal people to awake to the great importance of the issue. In his judgment we are fast approaching a crisis—a war, it may be, a religious war more terrible than the rebellion. We are asleep over a volcano. We must bestir ourselves, and that speedily, if we would avert the catastrophe. Already the enemies of religious freedom in this country are in motion; they are quietly organizing, and putting forth mighty efforts to forestall and control public opinion. What does the existence of the Young Men's Christian Association mean? For what purpose was that institution organized? It was the deliberate and well-laid plan of the Christian Church to bring about the political ends it had in view. It intended to remodel the Constitution, get possession of the government, and put down the anti-Christian party by the aid of law, at the point of the bayonet. We might shut our eyes to these plain facts, we might dream of peace, but Christian leaders meant war. Mr. Hull cited a number of cases in which Christianity was making encroachments on our liberties, and steadily moving towards the end of its ambition. He was in for the fight. He wanted no truce, no delay; but instant and unflinching zeal. He wanted freedom, freedom in its broadest sense—civil, religious, and social freedom.

B. F. Underwood was next invited to speak. He said that he came to the meeting not to participate in its proceedings but as an observer. But he was glad to express his hearty approval of the objects of the League. No true liberal but must feel a sense of duty resting upon him to help secure a compliance with these most just "demands of liberalism." It is a matter we cannot shirk. The work is to be done, and liberals must do it. He liked the idea of circulating tracts, sending them out by thousands over the country. We must educate the people. That done, the victory is won. We should circulate documents stating our arguments in such a way as not unnecessarily to offend our opponents, and at the same time convince them. He hoped the League would prosper. He should do all he could as he travelled about the country to help on the good work.

Mr. S. H. Morse was then invited to say a word, but declined, not attaching comparatively so much importance to the work of the League as others. He thought there were greater questions to be considered, but that was not the proper place to introduce them. The President said that they welcomed any position, and would be glad to hear from him. Mr. Morse then said he would simply ask the question, why the State had not as much right to tax the people for the support of churches as for schools. This drew forth several answers and questions, when Mr. Morse took the floor to explain his meaning further. He was of opinion that, if the majority regarded it as essential to the public welfare that religion should be supported and taught by the State, it had the same right to enact this that it had to establish the public school system. But he denied the right of the State to tax any one for the support of anything. For the individual to be secure in his freedom, he must act voluntarily. His private judgment and conscience must in all cases be respected. He would not add a tax where it was not, but would abolish existing taxes. He would permit our expensive and unprofitable systems of government to come to an end. He believed in practically carrying out the doctrine of self-government by abolishing what we are accustomed to call the State altogether.

Shortly after the meeting adjourned.

THE "TWO VIEWS OF FREE RELIGION."

DEAR ABBOT:—

In the paper of Nov. 20, you contrast two views of Free Religion, "the sympathetic" and "the intellectual" view. The reader's first thought is: "He means that we may not hope fairly to possess them both at once." But this proves to be the meaning only when one approaches from the side of sympathy. As you draw the pictures, the two are after all not two but one, provided that one be "the intellectual" view. You credit the former with a certain kind of devotion to the truth, then point out well its shortcomings. But for the latter you claim that it includes not one whit less of sympathy, while it adds, as its especial power, the insight to discern that unity of feeling must depend largely on unity of thought; and that therefore the only way radically to promote good-will is to expose error, accept the eternal law of battle, and use the surgeon's knife unapologetically, be the pain and uproar what they may. So "sarcasm, invective, persuasion, appeal, argument,—it matters not; let each use the tool he possesses according to his skill. So long as the good of mankind kindles his soul, so long is the reformer's work beneficent in spite of all temporary commotions, throes, or rages."

Is not this one-sided, a begging of the vantage-ground? So might another say (and you would not dispute), "As long as the man of sympathies does not let them blind him to the truth in any way, thus long he is sure to be beneficent." You are contrasting two typical dispositions and methods; and as you have taken pains to describe the bad tendencies of the one where it too much prevails, ought you to have pointed out only the good tendencies of the other where it does not too much prevail? May I fill in the empty corner of the sketch?

You cite a sincere bigot or persecutor insisting on his dogma as fundamental, to ask: "How can one establish peace with such a man save by showing him the falsity of his position? The close-communion Baptist would be recreant to his conscience unless he insisted on his point."

Let no man be a recreant to his conscience. But by the logic of "the intellectual view," might not the sincere bigot or persecutor be cited also as type of the true reformer? Perhaps you mean that he is. He adopts the intellectual view of religion. His action

"rests on perception of the impossibility of reconciling irreconcilables." He would insist that there could be no abiding peace till there is unity of thought, and would plead: "Sarcasm, invective, arguement, it matters not; let each use the tool he possesses according to his skill." Sometimes he possesses the sword, or the stake, or the gibbet of public opinion, and has the power and skill to use them, and has used them,—"in the love of truth and for the good of mankind."

If we radicals come to feel that those "two views" may be rightly divorced, and the first be taken while the last is left, we may indeed become mere liberals of vague speech or silent lips; but if the last be taken and the first one left, I think we shall be bigots.

For what is bigotry but the disposition to emphasize as fundamental the minor instead of the greater principles? To emphasize them, I say, as fundamental; for my thought may be very free from the ordinary bonds, and yet I shall practically be a bigot if my mind and heart are really engrossed in my special points, albeit important, rather than in those "simple yet grand truths of which," you say, "all humanity is possessed." I am a bigot, if my life sums up as more delight in any one idea or set of ideas, however helpful, than in what you say the sympathetic mind delights in—"moral progress, ideal excellence, and devout upward aspiration." These are surely the really fundamental things,—and not the meaning of "Christianity," or the detachment from authority in religion. Unity of feeling depends largely on unity of thought,—true; and here in fundamentals we have unity of thought, and therefore ground for ever-active unity of feeling. Our disagreements cannot be so great as our agreements. The most important principles must stand as such in our utterance and life, or, I should say, we shall miss the grandest, deepest truth; that is, our view falls even as an "intellectual view," if we do not keep facts in our minds proportioned as they are in Nature. But in most of us the perpetual military insistence on our special points almost inevitably produces the bigot's disproportion. In many one may fear it is somewhat great. Not most whom we hear speaking against current faiths speak as if it hurt them, or with a surgeon's desire to save pain; but rather with impatience and a sneer, or with a certain battle-joy.

Here lies, I think, the great danger of "the intellectual view," where it too much prevails. Those who hold it are apt to miss their own peculiar aim, and after all be fatally untrue to truth. It is in one sense misnamed "intellectual," because the real trouble is a lack, not a surplus, of insight; but it is that especial lack which, resulting less from weak eyes than from the cold heart, shows how inseparable intellect and feeling really are. Although all we see, we see with intellect, very much of what we see is seen, as it were, through sympathy. It is sympathy that keeps objects within our range of sight and carries our eyes into new ranges. If we have it deeply in us, those common fundamentals can never grow unduly dim to us, and we all the time enlarge and correct our vision by things which others see.

There is another danger,—which is not to be much thought of, unless what has been already said is true; but if that be true, it is to be thought of a good deal. Where this "intellectual view" prevails too much, one may not only become a bigot, but to others he will seem a bigot, and so he loses influence as a reformer. Should one urge: "Each one must do his good by giving help where others do not, and I, in pushing my special points with my own tool, am advancing those fundamental truths and principles in the most essential way: they are the spirit in my attack, the motive in my impeachment, the hope in all my work."—I should beg, for that work's sake, that they be shown more visibly. Press it in word, prove it in life, that the "two views" cannot be divorced, rather than suggest they may be.

A reform is a practical matter. Influence is what we want. We have to specialize exertion, but may do it too much and too carelessly. Save in crises or in times of rapidly increasing evils, to seem to pet a specialty makes a paper dull, a man uninteresting; it cuts off readers, thins an audience, and, when an evil is abating, and abating through many varied agencies, it deprives a cause of natural allies who feel disgusted at such narrow leadership. Sympathy depends largely on unity of thought; but, as just explained, it is almost as true to turn the sentence round and say, Unity of thought depends largely upon sympathy. Since men are greatly helped to "see" by their sympathies, and since it is our agreements with others that give us fulcrum and a place to stand where we may bring reforms to bear, and since what we advocate is specially rooted in those "grand and simple truths common to all humanity," and since most people fail to recognize the abiding active presence of those truths in men who push the less important points fifty-five minutes in the hour, would it not be wise to spend more time in visibly displaying their grandeur and simplicity? Whatever we are or think we are, this unduly "intellectual view" of Free Religion makes us seem bigots to the men who most need to feel its influence. Those already with us may applaud; but it is the unpersuaded masses beyond, that we wish to win. With them, urging the same bigoted as efficient as those who, urging the same truths, do it in such a way as to seem large-minded?

I do not deny the good brought about by the "one-thing-I-do" reformers. In history, such reformers deservedly get large credit, though often more than its really belongs to them. The after-age, with all its due praise for them, sees that they are narrow, and traces harm to that narrowness; and the harm often lives to check the good, till some other impeacher feels called to rise up and impeach the first and the system that stands in his name.

But in Free Religion, above all reforms, and in our day more than in all before, the one-sided "intellectual view" seems out of place. In our day,—because the belief in evolution is spreading as never before, and where it spreads it carries a new theory of progress, before which a crusading violence in urging ideas becomes the badge of the unnatural reformer, keeping up a mediocrity in the light of a new era. This is the broadest day the world has known. The "struggle for existence with survival of the fittest" will ceaselessly go on, but the metaphors of the battle-field do not hint the spirit or the practical method necessary to make the laws reach their best result most speedily. In science, ideas to-day struggle and vanish, or survive without uproar. Where exasperation enters, the unfit longest live. Men cannot but be more sensitive about their religions than their scientific thought; then the more, not the less, care should be taken to avoid exasperation. It does matter what tools are used,—and it seems more out of place in Free Religion than in other reforms, because this is the broadest of reforms. Thousands are in the movement who do not bear the name, but those who make bold to bear it ought to be in the centre of the line as well as in advance. We should not be, or, if we can help it, look, one-sided. We should represent the breadth, as well as the length, of the movement. I take it no man on earth by "True Church," "Church Catholic," "Orthodox," or any other lofty title, is so bound by his name, as we are bound by ours, to the open heart as well as the open mind, to good humor and cordial recognitions of every fellow-struggler towards the light and every blinded lottier. A Free-Religionist ill-humored, sneering, or satiric, I should say, belies his name. I speak as one but little tempted compared with many,—and yet as one confessing.

No; the deepest sympathy drives one on to the anti-theistic logic, and the clearest speech: the deepest truthfulness cannot give its best help, cannot exist, without active, expressive sympathy. The spirit of love compels the spirit of truth: the spirit of truth compels the spirit of love. When each is at its full, the "two views" are not two, but one; which is neither "the sympathetic" nor "the intellectual" view, but one for which both names are necessary,—Paul's "truthing-it-in-love." It is not a view "of Free Religion" which emphasizes either separately. Each, prevailing, brings peril by its tendency; but what right has one, as an advocate of Free Religion, to take such a view? If it be urged that temperaments differ, it still is question for a man,—especially for one in any way a public man,—to ask himself, "Which is the better temperament, the loving, the logical, or that which has both elements in large and equal measure?" Every one must, of course, do his own work in sincerity, and merits no blame for honest blundering; but in a good cause one cannot help regret for what he thinks is blunder, regret for influence hindered and the allies lost.

I think the clearest thing that can be urged by any method can be said as clearly, and urged as persistently, as energetically, and, in the long run, more influentially, by the method which couples open sympathy with open truthfulness.

Yours truly,
BOSTON, Dec. 1, 1873.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.

TO THE EDITOR:—

I was interested by the letter of C. W. Newton (published in THE INDEX of Oct. 10), on the subject of Judas. The character and crime of that unhappy man, at one period of my life, formed the subject of considerable reflection; and I wish it were possible to arrive at the truth about him. As De Quincy remarks: "In the greatest and most memorable of earthly tragedies, Judas is a prominent figure. So long as the earth revolves, he cannot be forgotten. If, therefore, there is a doubt affecting his case, he is entitled to the benefit of that doubt." Judas was the bête noir of medieval Catholicism: Dante, its best exponent, puts him in one of the mouths of his triple-headed Cerberian Satan, the head within, and tells us that, in common with his fellow-sufferers, Brutus and Cassius, he was champed by the teeth and bruised as with a ponderous engine, all the skin of his back being often stripped off by the fierce rending,—in strict accordance with the popular conception of the enormity of his guilt and its deserved punishment. By the popish populace of Southern Europe, it was long the custom, on Good Friday, to make an effigy of Judas, and subject it to all kinds of insult and ill-usage, finishing by burning or hanging it; the Portuguese vulgar do so to this day. Even in modern times, and among Protestants, the betrayer is regarded as outside the pale of forgiveness—the arch-monster of Christendom. It was reserved for the thoughtful Germans to take up his apparently desperate case and make the best of it. Most of us are acquainted with their view of his character and motives, which "the English Optum-Eater" adopted. It had been introduced before by R. H. Horne, the author of Orion, in a dramatic poem, and also by Disraeli, with more or less distinctness of assertion, in his Sidonian novels, in which Judas figures as a very respectable gentleman. Also, in another of his stories (Venetia, if I am not mistaken), regard and admiration are challenged for the Jewish race on account of its having furnished both the instrument and the means for the redemption of mankind. The question of Judas' real character, and the causes investigating his crime, involves perhaps insuperable difficulties, the record is so imperfect. I think we must, with Rénan, admit that "avarice, which the synoptics give as the motive, does not suffice to explain it. It would be very singular if the man who kept the purse, and who knew what he would lose by the death of his chief, were to abandon the profits of his occupation in exchange for a very small sum of money." Then we have his repentance, energetic repudiation of the bribe, and suicide (Matthew xxvii., 5), which are utterly incompatible with the character of a mere sordid traitor; one who, having secured his thirty pieces of silver, would hardly have been troubled by remorse at what he must have regarded as a foregone conclusion, but most likely have invested his money (as, indeed, he is represented as doing in Acts i., 18), and thought no more of the matter. I am afraid, too, that the German idea so admirably set forth by De Quincy is untenable. That may be condensed from his own words as follows:—

"Believing, as Judas did, that Christ contemplated the establishment of a temporal kingdom, but had not decision enough to risk a collision with the authorities, it became necessary that the Master should be precipitated into action, when he would no longer vacillate, but be forced into giving the signal to the populace of Jerusalem, who would then rise unanimously, for the double purpose of placing Christ at the head of an insurrectionary movement, and of throwing off the Roman yoke. Therefore Judas acted. He presumptuously assumed that he comprehended his Master and understood his purposes better than he did himself. His object was audacious in a high degree, but not treacherous at all."

Now this, however ingenious, subtle, and interesting, has the one great fault of possessing no corroborative evidence—unless Judas' suicide should be admitted as constructively such. (That event, too, is extremely disputable: in the verse of Acts, already alluded to, he is represented as "falling headlong in his field, and bursting asunder, so that all his bowels gushed out. . . ." There is not a word of his self-murder.) The German argument, indeed, resembles the famous camel, in being entirely evolved out of the theorist's own consciousness. We have too many of that kind of explanations: a strong proclivity towards them invalidates the otherwise admirable writings of Rénan. To very much that he advances we must say: "It may have been so, but how do you know about it? Mere hypothesis will not satisfy us, without proof." Then the record, though obscure, and, if you like, partial and prejudiced against Judas (in testimony of which Rénan instances John vi., 64, 71; xii., 6; xiii., 2, 27, and following), gives direct evidence of the fact of his worldliness. There is the dinner at Bethany and his notable objection to Mary's costly act of adoration; which, however, according to Matthew and Mark, other apostles shared. Judas' avarice must, I think, be admitted. One is inclined to allow that passion, in part, as an influencing motive to the betrayal, but to suspect something, of which we are uninformed, superadded. Rénan's supposition, that it originated in some feeling of jealousy or dissension among the disciples, would meet the case and explain the subsequent remorse and suicide. John, too, tells us, twice, that the devil entered into him (xiii., 2, 26); which might imply a sudden, impulsive fit of passion. Perhaps, in American vernacular, "he got mad and went and did it," and afterwards was sorry and hung himself. But we really have no evidence.

Of course, looking at the matter from the Orthodox point of view, C. W. Newton's plea on behalf of Judas would be highly just and reasonable. He is not the first who has justified him. There was a sect called the Cainites, in the second century, who ingeniously found out a reason for honoring the betrayer, because he foresaw what good would come to men from his action. There is no necessity for electing Judas a fifth person in the Trinity. Theodore Parker's "fourth or outlying member" will amply subserve all theologic purposes. In the words of John, we have only to suppose that "the devil put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot to betray him." To Satan, therefore, be all the credit for perfecting the scheme of human redemption. By the way, if it were worth while knocking another hole in what has been so completely riddled, "the inspired Word," it might be pointed out how the repeated foretelling of what must happen to him, by Jesus to his disciples (Matthew xx., 18, 19; Mark x., 33, 34; Luke xviii., 31, 32, and elsewhere), would be calculated either to frustrate or secure the fulfilment of the prediction.

MIDLAND, ENGLAND, Nov. 10, 1873.

TITUSVILLE, Pa., Oct. 28, 1873.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I have been a reader of your liberal paper for several years, and it has given me many pleasant hours. It does require a great deal of moral courage of you, born and raised as a good Christian,—that is, as one who should believe and have faith in what his great-grandfather had faith in, and not allow his own brain any liberty of action,—to think and act on the dictates of your own common sense. Of how much benefit it would be, if more of our learned and talented men could be influenced to let the world have the benefit of what Nature has intrusted to them! But, sir, they are afraid to declare their convictions, and act the hypocrite through life. One is afraid to injure his business, and others well-paying connections in life. Others, again, wish to represent the people and fill their pockets in Congress and Senate, and hope through hypocrisy to deceive every one. We find out too late the meanness of the man who represents us. Here, in the land of the free, is the battle of priestly dominion to be fought. They have found out that Europe is like a child, who burned its fingers once, and will not trust them again in the fire. The Council at Rome opened the eyes of Europe. The Evangelical Alliance will open the eyes of America. We will ask ourselves, what have these holy men who came here at a great expense from every corner of the world—what have they accomplished? What new idea have they proposed to satisfy the spirit of the nineteenth century? They tell us faith in Christ is the key to heaven; that is to say, in darkness you must find your everlasting home. For myself, I prefer light. Since God said, "let there be light," it is not good for man to be in darkness. He must have known the man whom he created with a desire after truth and knowledge. If a truth is to be proven, it does not need an Alliance to prove it; the truth must come out. If you say that the horse has a tail, you need no Alliance to prove it. But if you say that God is one, and one is three, it does need an Alliance to prove it. In the trial of Stokes for killing Fisk, it needs an alliance of witnesses to prove that he is innocent. How is it that the Jews have kept their faith in One Supreme Power through all ages of oppression? Because their belief is in accordance with the nature of man. It gives every man the right to think and act for himself. His belief is in a ruling Power, no matter what name you give to the same. You may call it Nature, as I do. It is the conviction of all Jews, and makes them all one people, without priests, without missionaries, and without Alliances. They consider that religion is made for the good of man, but not man to be the slave of religion. I know, if God has the power to look down from heaven, and sees in this beloved land of ours how we get robbed and cheated by the ministers of U. S. Grant, he will forgive our sins for not trusting in man, but coming to him direct, and asking for assistance to carry us through this life and the life to come.

Yours,

N. GROSSMAYER.

FROM MR. PILLSBURY.

SALEM, Ohio, Nov. 20, 1873.

DEAR FRIEND ABBOT:—

Salem bravely holds its own in liberal thought, and other things liberal; true to her early antecedents. Hicksite Quakers are almost ex-officio Liberal Religionists; and most of them in Salem are now seen regularly at the "Broad Gauge Church," as the Free Religionist Sunday congregation is now called,—perhaps, not improperly called. The adhering Hicksites have the largest and best house, but we much the largest congregation; and very friendly relations appear to subsist all round.

In a population of only four thousand, we fill a small or moderate-sized Baptist meeting-house, which we have appropriated and promoted to our purposes, respectfully full in all weathers. And yet we are the eleventh in number of regular Sunday congregations. I heard a man say the other day "it was truly wonderful how those Broad Gauge Quakers kept up, and increased even without any fear of hell at all in their preaching."

The West suffers severely by the commercial distress. Salem, being largely a manufacturing town, feels very heavily the pressure, and the Free Religionists are among the largest manufacturers, some of them; but so far all survive the panic. And so with us neither Sunday nor weekday-work declines in demands or supply. All appear to rejoice in the prosperity of THE INDEX. I shall on next Sunday morning refer to it, and present your proposals for new subscribers, and renewals of old subscriptions.

Very sincerely and truly yours,
PARKER PILLSBURY.

THEODORE PARKER.

ANOTHER BUST OF THE GREAT RADICAL THINKER AND PREACHER.

Mr. S. H. Morse has on exhibition at his studio, No. 25 Bromfield Street, a bust of the late Theodore Parker, which is as yet unfinished, but which has been pronounced a success by those who knew him intimately. The bust represents Mr. Parker when he was about forty years of age, and immediately after his arrival in Boston, and, of course, differs materially from pictures and statuettes which have been produced in later years. The face is scraggy and uneven, its lines drawn prominently, and the mouth is so constructed as to give the expression of mingled haughtiness and settled conviction. It is the best representation of Mr. Parker ever executed in clay, as it is marked by a strong desire on the part of the artist to avoid idealism, and stick closely to his models.

The bust will be cast on Friday, and until then Mr. Morse proposes to have it open for criticism, and invites those who knew Mr. Parker well in life to inspect it. It will be sold by subscription at $10, and already the subscription list is well represented. Coming as it does almost simultaneously with the completion of the Parker-Memorial meeting-house, and the publication of Mr. Frothingham's life of the great agitator, it cannot fail to be eminently successful. This is Mr. Morse's first work, and it is meeting with flattering encouragements.—Boston Globe, of Dec. 3.

A SEA CAPTAIN invited to meet the committee of a society for the evangelization of Africa, when asked: "Do the subjects of the King of Dahomey keep Sabbath?" replied, "Yes, and everything else they can lay their hands on."

FOOTE ONCE asked a man without a sense of tune in him: "Why are you forever humming that tune?" "Because it haunts me," was the reply. "No wonder," answered Foote; "You are forever murdering it."

A NEBRASKA man, on his dying bed, remembered that his wife was smoking some hams, and he said: "Now, Henrietta, don't go snuffling round and forget them hams."

Cultured Free Thought.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

OFFICE NO. 1 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of our country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. ABBOT. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. ABBOT, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

HIS MARRIAGE VOW.

BY

MRS. CAROLINE FAIRFIELD CORBIN,

Author of "Rebecca; or, A Woman's Secret," &c.

12mo. Price $1.20.

[From the Tribune, New York City.]

From a commendatory notice of over a column in length we extract the following:—

"His Marriage Vow," by Mrs. Caroline F. Corbin, is a novel sufficiently pronounced in its tone, and strong in its statements of them, to provoke discussion. It purports to be written in the interest of marriage, and yet it is as far removed from the ascetic morality which would condemn a man for discovering that a flower was a rose because it grew outside of his own garden as from that license which would pluck a rose, no matter where it grew, because it is sweet. Mrs. Corbin claims to deal with human nature as it is, striving always to elevate it toward what it should be. It is a book sure to be read and discussed, and to make both friends and foes. The characters are too much alike, too full of the actual emotions of actual people, not to make their mark. It remains to say that "His Marriage Vow" has many striking literary merits.

[From the Evening Journal, Chicago.]

From a careful perusal of an early copy of Mrs. Corbin's new book,—which, the numerous readers of "Rebecca" will be glad to learn, is nearly ready for publication,—we gather that while the author holds somewhat advanced views concerning the relations of the sexes, she stoutly maintains the supreme sanctity of the marriage institution, and claims that it is equally binding upon those who take upon themselves its holy vows. In the end, virtue triumphs, and the rich fruits of discipline and self-denial are placed to the credit of those laws, deemed arbitrary and un-called-for by some, but which, as is proved by universal experience, lie at the basis of all chaste and progressive life.

[From the Sunday Times, Boston.]

This novel, which will be published during the current week, is likely to provoke earnest but various comment. It deals with a phase of that long-veiled and apparently insoluble question,—the relations of the sexes,—which few writers have ventured to treat. The leading idea of the author seems to be to define true love, and to set forth its power in the conduct of life. Love is the cure of all evil, all crime; it is, in fact, religion. In illustration of this theory, she has constructed a story of singular intensity and vigor. Her convictions are earnest, and she records them with a force that is almost vehement. The book is evidently the product of a thoughtful mind and a heart that longs for the adjustment of sexual relations on their true basis. It gives evidence of wide and careful reading, and is written with a nervous strength which is quite impressive. In view of the peculiar and delicate nature of its theme, the novel and attractive style which it enforces, and the daring approach which it makes to the very limit of conventional proprieties, it must inevitably command general attention.

[From the Daily Tribune, Chicago.]

Man: in the Past, Present, and Future. Buechner, Dr. L. A Popular Account of the results of recent scientific Research as regards the Origin, Evolution, and Prospects of the Human Race. Translated by W. S. Dallas, F.L.S. Cloth. 12mo. $3.50. [Elegant English Edition.]

CONTENTS: INTRODUCTION--WHENCE DO WE COME? The Antiquity and Original State of the Human Race, and its development from a barbarous beginning.--WHAT ARE WE?--Present Position of Man in Nature, his developmental history and production from the egg cell--Origin and Genealogy of the Human Race.--WHERE ARE WE GOING?--Future of Man and of the Human Race--Government--Nationalities--Society--Capital, Labor and Law--The Family--Education--Woman--Marriage--Morals--Religion--Philosophy.

APPENDIX.—Scientific Evidence, containing Notes, Explanations, and additions of the text.

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."—Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."—Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions--'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?' are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."—Scotsman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced in opposition to those which it supports."—Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."—Medical Times and Gazette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and out-spoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Buechner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed minutely anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a pithy and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign accounts in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."—Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Buechner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with praiseworthy neatness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."—Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against, and delivering judgment after independent investigation."—Public Opinion.

Force and Matter. By Dr. Buechner. Latest authorized edition. 12mo. Cloth. $3.50.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against, and delivering judgment after independent investigation."—Public Opinion.

The Essence of Religion.

GOD THE IMAGE OF MAN.
 Man's Dependence upon Nature the Last and Only Source of Religion.

Translated from the German of LUDWIG FEUERBACH, by Professor A. Loos.

12mo. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

To see man trembling and existing at the sight of his own shadow touched Feuerbach to reason. Feuerbach's Atheism was intended to restore man to himself. His Materialism was designed to prevent man's exalting in dreams. He denied the personal immortality of the soul--the belief, and for the same reason that he denied the personal existence of God. He wished to preserve integrity of existence, to make mortality immortal, to breathe the spirit of eternity with time, to compress all humanity within human limits, and get the full benefit of this life while it lasted. He was jealous of the future life; he begrudged every drop of feeling that spilled over the edge of the grave, and lost on the other side. This world was rich enough for him, and ought to be rich enough for anybody; and to see it neglected, misused, flouted, and heart-sick--Feuerbach's Horticultural Hall Lecture, Jan. 1873.

Materialism:

ITS ANCIENT HISTORY, ITS RECENT DEVELOPMENT, ITS PRACTICAL BENEFICE.

By DR. L. EYCHENBERG, author of "Force and Matter," "Man in Nature," &c., &c.

Translated from the author's manuscript by Professor A. Loos. 25 cents.

The Childhood of the World;

A SIMPLE ACCOUNT OF MAN IN EARLY TIMES.

By EDWARD CLODD, F.R.S.

12mo. Paper, 30 cents. Cloth, 75 cents.

Extract from a letter from Professor Max Müller to the author:--"I read your book with great pleasure. I have no doubt it will do good, and hope you will continue your work. Nothing is so young, manhood, and even old age, so many things which we were taught as children, and which you will prepare a far better soil in the child's mind, and I was delighted to hear it read to my children."
 E. B. Tylor, F.R.S., in "Nature" says:--"This genial little volume is a book of style, though terse, chequered, and satirical of style, though the author reasonably hopes that older people will use it as a source of information not popularly accessible elsewhere, as to the life of humanity, and its relation to our own."
 The title Man and its relation to the public to take to it, will have a certain effect in the world. It is not a mere compilation from the authors mentioned in the preface, but takes its own ground, and stands by and for itself. Mr. Clodd has thought out his philosophy of life, and used his best skill to bring it into the range of a child's view."

ORGANIZE!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

A FORM OF LOCAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas, It is our profound conviction that the safety of republican institutions is imperilled, the advance of civilization impeded, and the most sacred rights of man infringed, by the least interference of the State in matters of religion; and

Whereas, Certain grave inconsistencies with the general spirit of the United States Constitution still mark the practical administration of our political system, threatening the perpetuity of religious liberty, the existence of free public schools, and the peace and prosperity of the entire land;

Therefore, We, the undersigned, hereby associate ourselves together under the following

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT.

- ART. 1.—The name of this Association shall be THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF —.
- ART. 2.—The object of the Liberal League shall be to secure practical compliance with the "Demands of Liberalism" throughout the country, and especially in —:
- Also, as soon as five hundred such Liberal Leagues shall have been formed in different places, to send two delegates to a National Convention of Liberal Leagues, to be hereafter called, in order to co-operate with all the liberals of the country in securing the needed reforms.
- ART. 3.—The means employed in working for these objects shall be regular local meetings, free discussions, lectures, addresses, conventions, the platform and the press in general, and all such other means as are peaceable, orderly, and right.
- ART. 4.—Such measures shall be adopted for raising funds for the League as shall be prescribed in the By-Laws by a two-thirds vote of the members.
- ART. 5.—Any person may become a member of the League by subscribing his or her name to these Articles of Agreement.
- ART. 6.—The Officers of the League shall be a President, a Vice President, a Secretary, a Treasurer, and an Executive Committee of three members; and their duties shall be those commonly pertaining to these offices. The President and Secretary shall be ex-officio delegates to the National Convention of Liberal Leagues when called together.
- ART. 7.—These Articles of Agreement may be amended by a three-fourths vote of the members present at any regular meeting, provided due notice of the proposed amendments shall have been sent to every member at least two weeks previous to such meeting.

So far as I am concerned, the above is the platform of THE INDEX. I believe in it without reserve; I believe that it will yet be accepted universally by the American people, as the only platform consistent with religious liberty. A Liberal League ought to be formed to carry out its principles wherever half a dozen earnest and resolute Liberals can be got together. Being convinced that the movement to secure compliance with these just "Demands" must surely, even if slowly, spread, I hope to make THE INDEX a means of furthering it; and I ask the assistance and active co-operation of every man and every woman who believes in it. Multiply Liberal Leagues everywhere, and report promptly the names of their Presidents and Secretaries. Intolerance and bigotry will tremble in proportion as that list grows. If freedom, justice, and reason are right, let their organized voice be heard like the sound of many waters.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

BY A. W. E.

WHAT SUBTILTY of metaphysics can excel the Irishman's definition of nothing—"A footless stocking without legs"?

The Shaker and Shakeress, published by the United Society of Shakers, Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., is a neat, sweet, fresh, and liberal publication.

THE QUAKERS recently held, at Lynn, in this State, their seventh biennial "Friends' National First-Day [Sunday] School Conference." Delegates were present from Canada to North Carolina, and from Maine to Iowa.

"A LIFE AGAINST A LIE." This phrase, employed by one of the speakers at a recent meeting of Plymouth Church, in Brooklyn, N. Y., is a good one. Let it stand for its worth per se, and let it apply in every case where it is applicable.

ARAPASIA, Cleopatra, Zenobia, Hypatia,—what names of women were these that graced the classic era! In all ages when there have been great men there have also been great women; for half of man's greatness is derived from woman's wit, woman's tact, woman's inspiration, woman's influence.

THE TROUBLE with special reformers is, that they think that their pet theory or idea is the one thing needful to bring in the millennium. Methods may be very important, but principles are more so. We must take human nature into account when we go to reform the world. "Whatever helps that rightly to develop itself, is good. But beware of too much manipulation!"

THE EDITOR of the Israelite—Rabbi Isaac M. Wise—thinks that "Judaism, in its pure and denationalized form, will and must become the religion of all free men." We suppose that the enthusiastic devotees of every other religious denomination are ready to make the same prophecy concerning their own faith; but it is not wise, at present, to say what the name and form of the future religion "will and must" be.

FRANCE is said to be a perfect paradise for authors, there being no country in the world in which literary labor is so remunerative, and whose literary writers become so wealthy. Thiers is nearly a millionaire; Victor Hugo is very rich; George Sand is the wealthiest authoress in the world; Dumas, Girardin, About, Sardou, Karr, Janin, and a long list of others, have large incomes. Even Henri Rochefort is said to have a good deal of money.

"How to LIVE in a manner resembling the gods, was the fundamental problem which he set himself to solve." This is said of Plato, by G. H. Lewes, in his Biographical History of Philosophy. The Christian's problem is, how to live like Christ. The Rationalist's problem is, how to make the actual life resemble the ideal one. But they all mean substantially the same thing. What each man has to do is to make his life resemble the highest of which he has any conception. This desire and effort after perfection obliterate all distinctions between pagan and Christian, Orthodox and infidel.

BISHOP POTTER favors (as of course he would) the proposed new Episcopal cathedral in New York; and his reason for so doing is significant. He thinks that "the possession of a cathedral would tend much to elevate the mind in regard to religious matters, and infuse new life into the members of the Church." The vitality of a religious denomination must be low, indeed, when it needs a new church to revive it! A new suit of clothes to each member would, perhaps, have the same effect! To be in "the fashion," and to excel in it, would appear to be as stimulating to "saints" as to "sinners."

WM. LLOYD GARRISON, in the Christian Union, thinks that, "if with the free institutions we possess, with present unlimited exercise of free thought and free inquiry concerning religious faith and practice, with every advantage of means, appliances, and numbers in the dissemination of truth against error, we are unable to maintain our ground [against Romanism], then it can only be because we are recreant to our trust. With such odds as are now in its favor, if Protestantism must go to the wall, then to the wall let it go! It can have in itself neither faith nor courage, neither accompanying grace nor renovating power."

BISHOP LAVINGTON—a bishop of the Church in the eighteenth century—in an address to the clergy said: "My brethren, I beg you will rise up with me against moral preaching. We have long been attempting the reformation of the world by discourses of this kind. With what success? None at all. On the contrary, we have dexterously preached the people into downright infidelity. We must change our voice. We must preach Christ and him crucified." The old bishop was right. The whole Christian system turns upon the pivotal doctrine of the Atonement. Therefore, if that system be true, only "Christ and him crucified" should be preached. "What is the use of 'mere morality,' when 'the blood of Christ' is sufficient for salvation? Let Christians stick to their text."

IN BUCKLE'S History of Civilization this paragraph occurs: "From the moment men began to insist on inquiring into the validity of first principles, instead of accepting them without inquiry, and humbly submitting to them as matters of faith and of necessary belief,—from that moment, the theologians, driven from one post to another, and constantly receding before the pressure of advancing knowledge, have been forced to abandon entrenchment after entrenchment, until what they have retained of their former territory is hardly worth the struggle." Hardly worth, indeed, in our eyes; yet, in the eyes of many of those who still so desperately "struggle" to retain it, it may appear of very great worth. We prefer to believe, if we can, that people are absurd rather than that they are dishonest.

IT SEEMS THAT the New York World is not an admirer of Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, and recently it took occasion to express its disapprobation of the reverend gentleman in some caustic editorial remarks. Although Mr. Talmage has a paper of his own, in which he might have replied, he chose his pulpit for such a medium instead; and on Sunday, Nov. 4, he religiously "went for" the World in his prayer. First, he prayed "for all who fill editorial chairs" (THE INDEX editors are grateful for their share in this petition); then he became more explicit, and said: "We pray for the editors of the New York World, that they may be converted to God, and by thy grace prepare for heaven. May the blessing of God come down upon them and their children forever!" This is a curious mingling of magnanimity and revenge, and is highly worthy of the sublime Talmage.

OUR BRETHREN, the Jews, certainly have occasion to congratulate themselves on the importance to which certain of their membership have arrived, both in the world of thought and of affairs. Spinoza is their great thinker; and no single writer has exerted a profounder influence on the development of modern thought than Spinoza, the Jew. In financial leadership, the Rothschilds are pre-eminent; and they are Jews. In European politics, today, three of the most prominent figures belong to the Jewish faith. Emilio Castelar, President of the Spanish Republic, we are told, is a Jew; Gambetta, in France, is a Jew,—sharing with Thiers the leadership of French republicanism; Disraeli, who has been and probably will be again England's premier, is a Jew. We rejoice that this long despised and persecuted race are able thus to pluck honors from Christendom's reluctant hand, and to bring themselves into the world's free parliament of thought and action.

Woman: Her Rights and Duties.

AN ESSAY

Read before the Second Radical Club of Boston, Nov. 10, 1873.

BY FREDERICK A. HINCKLEY.

Every human being has certain rights and duties. The first and most important of these is the right to the fullest possible development of all the faculties. That is what education, broadly and worthily considered, means. Not what we so often think it—a little mathematics, a smattering of Greek and Latin, and a weak show of so-called accomplishments; but the building up of the human structure, the steady growth of character. Whatever contributes to this development and growth belongs by right to humanity. Whoever undertakes to monopolize it is a usurper. Nor can the individual be in any way limited in its use, provided he does not infringe upon the like privilege for every other man. Such is the law of the universe. There can be no life without growth, and whatever contributes to growth is common property. There must be no insurmountable conditions to its acquirement. There is no higher duty than to take this right and make the most of it. If resistance to the taking of it be offered, then duty justifies the use of every peaceable measure possible in its defence. It has been held that in such cases duty not only justified but compelled war. Our revolutionary war was a notable instance of this sort. But war is repugnant to the enlightened conscience, and the sword of itself never cured anything. The right of peaceable resistance is, however, another thing, and becomes a solemn duty whenever this universal human right to education and growth is encroached upon. Of course a law so broad, a right thus universal, must be applicable to every human being regardless of race, sex, condition, or color. To deny it to a man because he is poor, or black, or to a woman because she is a woman, is a manifest denial of the principle itself, and the grossest of outrages upon individual liberty.

What follows concerning woman? Why, that she has a right and a duty to take possession of every means necessary to her highest development as a human being, provided always that she does not infringe upon a like right and duty for every other person. To give health and wholeness to her life and character is her first right and duty. Let us see how the right is granted, and the duty exercised. Perchance at this very moment there are being born into the world two immortal souls. One shall be a boy, the other a girl. Their lives are to be moulded in part by their parents, afterward by themselves, all the time by existing social institutions and customs. What is the prevailing spirit running through these? Scarcely are the new comers out of babyhood before invidious distinctions begin. The skirts, which are destined to be the life-long curse of the girl, soon get too inconvenient and clumsy for the boy, and he kicks himself out of them and into something warmer and better in every respect. His arms and legs are henceforth allowed free swing, a right vigorously maintained and exercised wherever he goes. He is encouraged to active exercise, and taught to be self-reliant. From the start, in school, college, and home, he is trained to the idea that he must pull his own oars. Perhaps he sets up a little business in a corner of his father's lot, where out of school hours he raises hens, and sells eggs to his mother. Perhaps on the school platform he declaims that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Whatever he does, whatever he is urged to do, be sure that it will be something to educate his faculties, and fit him for future duties. And so he goes from one thing to another, until he finally enters manhood, a self-respecting and respected unit.

But the poor girl—alas for her! she goes half clothed, and in almost every particular improperly clothed. Freedom of muscular action is made impossible for her. Her hands cannot touch her head, her lungs cannot properly expand, her digestive organs cannot freely perform their functions. She is early taught that it is unladylike to play and run in the open air, that her brother can do anything he wishes, but she can do but one kind of work, often not even that; namely, help her mother in the kitchen without remuneration. Many a girl has felt the gross injustice of working day after day for nothing, when her brother was encouraged by some trifling pay for his little services. He is trained to the idea of working for pay, that he may become a self-reliant man,—she, to working for nothing, or at best for some vague sentiment; such as the duty of a daughter to her mother. Such help usually and properly amounts to nothing. There are duties which children should voluntarily and cheerfully render to their parents, and the boys should not be allowed to evade them, nor the girls to look upon them as compulsory.

But the lack of self-reliance is not the only evil arising from this distinction. The girl is stunted and made a hot-house plant, her tastes fostered—for gew-gaws and confectionery—and her education "finished," as they say, with school. Then she is launched into life without much knowledge, very little, if any, self-reliance, and a corrupted physical and mental organization; sometimes a toy for fops to play with, occasionally and to her infinite credit, considering the circumstances, an efficient help-meet and counsellor, often a dead-weight, more ornamental than useful, a quantity but not a quality in the world. Custom, which favored the boy at every step, has cursed her with limitations and falsities. It now demands, with the approval of many otherwise sensible men and women, that one of her duties is to make herself beautiful. Of course, every human being should seek to do the right thing, the true and noble thing, and to possess the beauty which comes of that. When a woman makes herself a martyr for an idea, when she gives herself to some great work, then she is indeed beautiful. It is the kind of beauty which is its own excuse for being. This, however, loses half its charm when it becomes self-conscious. But this is not the beauty which people mean when they talk of its being woman's province to make herself beautiful. What they mean is the very essence of self-consciousness. It is that woman shall study dress, shall see how much she can call attention to her own person. This has come to be a demand of society, and every woman lacking a strong development of independent character feels that she must meet it. Nay, worse than that. It does not occur to her to question but that it is all right she should meet it. Now in the nature of things such an idea is pernicious in the extreme. It is one of the giant wrongs which the present state of society does woman. It trains her from her earliest years to be a doll, fills her head with effeminate notions instead of healthy ideas, and encourages her to dress in a manner which every honest physiologist must condemn. In obedience to a corrupt idea of beauty, the body is laced out of all true beauty, and the mind made a storehouse for rubbish.

Strangely enough, this weak result has been recognized by a noted reformer as the work of Nature. He does not call it weakness, but a "sensitiveness of structure."

And this is beauty,—at all events the price which woman pays for the divine destiny of motherhood. Such words at a time when the whole tendency is to look upon woman as naturally diseased, given to sickness, and altogether the weaker vessel, physically and mentally, are, to say the least of them, unwise. They serve to rivet chains already too heavy for the aspiring, free spirit to bear. They are the offspring of a weak sentimentality. Doubtless in its present state womanhood is not equal to the exertions of manhood; but womanhood as God made it, and womanhood as man has perverted it, are two very different things.

Physicians are necessary now, limitations are inevitable now; not because they are divinely appointed for woman, but because, by false physical education, by a weak and wicked idea of beauty, she has ceased to be a natural growth. It is her right to have the limitations removed, her duty to see to it that they are removed, by the gradual unfolding of higher powers, and a strict adherence to Nature's laws. Take off the artificial limitations of steel and whalebone, of heavy uncomfortable skirts, and tight waists, of exclusive culinary and hot-house culture, and let woman go one hundred years without them, before you begin to talk about the natural limitations of sex.

The baby with which we started has now passed through girlhood, and stands, as it were, at the parting of the ways. She has graduated from the high school, and, if much force of character is hers, is naturally asking, What next? She can rely upon her father for support, and help her mother in the kitchen and parlor in payment therefor; but few girls are satisfied to spend their lives in such a way, and this is not one of them. What is left, then, for her? She must either study more, work for herself, or be married.

So she comes, if a sensible girl, to an examination of these three departments of life, neither of which is opposed to the others, but between all of which there should be a natural sympathy. They are—

1. The Higher Education of Woman,
2. The Employments of Woman, and
3. The Married Life of Woman.

Putting ourselves for a moment in her place, let us examine each of these.

Movements looking to the higher education of woman are being prosecuted with marked success; and many seem to think that in their own good time men will welcome her to the halls of learning, and until then she had better remain outside. It is hard to see how this position can be reconciled with our fundamental proposition. According to that, it is woman's right and duty to enjoy all means possible for a full development of all her faculties, and to take possession of these means whenever and wherever she can, peaceably and honorably. To this end she must make her demand felt. She often goes to the individual, or the State, as the poor creature at your door comes begging for bread.

Such is not the proper attitude for people reclaiming their own. If Harvard College refuses admission to women on equal terms in every respect with men, if the Institute of Technology asks for additional privileges with which to build up a male aristocracy of learning, they must bear the consequences of having their requests for aid refused. The State has no right to grant aid or help, in any way, except upon the fundamental condition that all distinctions of sex shall cease. It could with more justice legislate for Protestants as against Catholics, or Unitarians as against Orthodox, since in the latter cases the barriers set up would not be absolutely insurmountable in their nature. The State represents the people, and cannot rightfully legislate in favor of one portion of the people as against another portion.

There is no meaner prejudice in existence than that which would foster exclusive male institutions for instruction. It is blind to the everlasting law which makes one sex necessary to the other in all departments of life,—a law which would carry the refining influence of the true woman into every college and institute, to purify and tone the characters of the young men.

Dr. Howe and others say that insane people should not be herded together, but should associate with the sane. The same law holds good with all people, and everywhere. Dark complexions and light, young and old, men and women, come together naturally, and to the advantage of all concerned. In the lecture-room, in art, in literature, to a certain extent, the reforming, elevating effect of bringing the sexes together has been already seen. It only remains to carry the principle a little further to see still more glorious results. But the separation of the sexes, bad as that is, is not the only evil arising from the present system. Woman is practically deprived of the higher branches of education. Why should she not occupy the pulpit? Why should she not plead at the bar? Most of all, why should she not practise medicine? What could be more appropriate than that female physicians should attend the cases of diseases peculiar to women, what more inappropriate than that men should do so? And, certainly, in that experience which is in no just sense a sickness, but a function of health, that of bringing into the world the little men and women who are to make for good or for evil its citizens, women are naturally best fitted for attendants and advisers. But they cannot fill such positions without study, and they cannot study to advantage if at every step they have to fight down prejudices, explore the mysteries of science outside of scientific institutions, or at best do the hard work of study without winning its honors. Who can tell what quack nostrums, now invented on the supposition that woman is naturally a creature of disease, will be consigned to oblivion under the scrutiny of her educated scientific eye? How many limbs may be saved, aye, how many whole bodies saved, when she holds the knife, and superintends the treatment of the mother?

Nothing is plainer than that men have made a monopoly of preaching, pleading, and prescribing. The result in morals, law, and medicine is what might have been expected—corruption. To set it right is the work of time; but sooner or later, gradually or suddenly, we must go back to fundamental principles. If an association of ministers sets up a fence, saying to woman, "Inside this sacred enclosure thou shalt not come;" if courts of justice exclude her from acting as judge, lawyer, or juror; if the medical profession decline to receive into the advantages of their fraternity the women who stand knocking at their doors,—the sooner they each and all are informed that they are the most inexcusable of cliques, the better. The gates to colleges, and all the higher institutions of learning, must not only be ajar, they must be open wide to women as to men.

It is claimed that woman is not physically equal to hard, scientific study. Well, if that is so, what risk in giving her the opportunity for it? Surely she will not long continue to do that which Nature has made her incapable of doing. But when learned doctors say that women are not physically able to do this thing and that thing, what do they judge from? Have they not struck the same rock which nearly capsize our reformer's ethics? Is it woman as God made her, or society's perversion of her? There was a time when Bible, Constitution, everything human and divine, was claimed as on the side of chattel slavery. That time has gone by. We can hardly forgive now the men who accepted the South-side interpretations. The time is when we accept as fore-ordained the slavery of woman to "all the ills that flesh is heir to." In the not distant future it will be very hard to forgive the Jefferson Davises of this last barbarism. Occasionally in the old days some fugitive slave who rebelled against the condition of things to which Nature had consigned him, taking the North star as his guide, would cut a way to freedom. So, thank God, spite of the quibbles of fossils, there are fugitives now from the slavery of enforced female ignorance. They knock at doors most of which are barred against them. Quite often they distance ten times their own number of the male sex in the race. Against such a force, continually increasing in strength and influence, the old system cannot stand. "You may pile your Capitol high in granite," said Wendell Phillips once; "if it be founded on injustice, the pulse of a girl will in time beat it down." Against these one-sided systems of education, the pulse of an honorable ambition is beating, and lo! they creak and tumble to their final fall. Gain the victory without a struggle? Yes, if you can. But remember what has been gained thus far has been by the pioneers, who have toiled day and night, knowing no such word as fail. Is it fair to them, is it fair to womankind, for you who go through life unannoyed by great ambitions, to sit down and say, "Gentlemen, we want these privileges, but we await your pleasure." No; rather say, "Gentlemen, we demand that which is ours; by refusing us, you uphold a system of gross injustice; you keep us, who ought to be your equals and companions in knowledge, your inferiors and slaves. Welcome to your side, in all branches of learning, the sex to which your wives, mothers, and sisters belong."

Before such an appeal few true men could stand long. To-day they think women have all they want. They ought not to withhold the opportunities on that account any more than the nation should have withheld freedom because some slaves did not want it. But it furnishes an excuse which nothing but the decided action of woman herself can remove.

It is her right, may I not say her duty also, to take an aggressive attitude in presenting this demand. It is not your rose-water conflicts that win victory. It is the women whose lives have been a continual struggle, who have presented Zenobia to the world. When at every cut of the chisel the cry has gone forth—"Unsexed!" they have mastered theology, law, medicine. When the church cried, "Let the women keep silence," the court said, "They contaminate and are contaminated by the men," and the doctors stood aghast in holy horror—then, as with the keen sweep of an intuitive perception, they have explored some long-cherished theory of the craft.

These women have fought battles for the education of their sex, and what has been gained is due to them, not to the silly notion that women should go submissively without their rights until men voluntarily grant them.

This demand for a higher education, while more fundamental than many others, is still the most conservative one which woman makes. It is the demand which naturally excites most sympathy, the demand to which it is the hardest to say no. Neither sex is alone responsible that to-day it is denied. But the louder and more imperative the demand on the part of woman, the fainter will be the opposition on the part of man, until finally they shall seek the fountains of knowledge side by side.

The majority of girls, however, do not desire, as the world is at present organized, to pursue the higher branches of book learning. If in a healthy condition, mentally and physically, they turn naturally to the world of work. Perhaps most of them, when not in such condition, are obliged to work or starve. Here into some channels they can go, although on poor pay and with a certain loss of caste. A young woman, for example, if possessed of a fair amount of intelligence, may teach on a salary about one-third of what a man would get for the same service, no better done. But when we leave teaching, and come down to tending in shops, and especially to needle-work, we find that while in most cases barely a living is earned, in many instances there is actually not enough received to keep body and soul together. What is the result? That terrible blot on society which we call the social evil. Whether in Paris on the authority of Duchatelet, or in Boston on the authority of the Chief of Police, and the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, we find that the one cause prominent above all others of prostitution is poverty.

Duchatelet says: "Of all causes of prostitution in Paris, and probably in all great towns, none is so active as the want of work, or inadequate remuneration. What are the earnings of our laundresses, seamstresses, and milliners? Compare the price of labor with the price of dishonor, and you will cease to be surprised that women fall."

Chief of Police Savage, in his Report for 1872, page 45, says of night-walkers, "that parties of whom there was a reasonable hope of reform have been either provided with some suitable employment, or sent to their friends in the country."

Mark the words—"provided with some suitable employment."

The Report of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labor for 1871, page 270,—an invaluable contribution to this question,—says: "Not a few cases have come under our personal observation, where insufficient food and the want of proper clothing have ended in a death that could be called nothing but starvation; and alas, many more have confessed to us, some with shame and remorse, others with the defiant question, 'What else could I do?' that they had sold their womanhood for bread to sustain life."

So the testimony might be multiplied; but enough. Is it strange that girls whose training is false from the time they leave their mother's arms, thrown upon the world to wring from its unwilling purse the poor crust which wealth would not give its dog, should fall before the temptations of base but honored men?

I know dark pictures are painted of the hardened girls who walk the streets to tempt the men. How often are we told of some innocent, virtuous countryman led into vice by such. Did you ever ask, if this be so, who first tempted these girls? The Chief of Police of Boston, looking through official eyes, says they are the victims. And yet society, Adam-like, pronounces them the sinners. Now women may not be better than men, nor men than women, when the balance is struck; but the sins of the one are not the sins of the other. Every honest man who has a virtuous wife at home, one who is worthy to represent her sex, knows that in this matter of prostitution, in nine cases out of ten, women are the victims. Why are they the victims? Because poverty, staring them constantly in the face, says dishonor or starvation. "Why not starvation, then?" say you. Ah! that would be unseen, unrecognized martyrdom. Has this society, for which you and I are in part responsible, given girls in its standard of training the elements which make martyrs? Then think of the women who really do sacrifice themselves for others.

Mrs. Dall, in her lecture on "Death or Dishonor," gives, as an example of this kind, a young girl of seventeen years, who had the charge of a sick, crippled sister. They were left to touch the very brink of despair. A kindly, fair-faced woman brought work which saved them from death. More was promised, on conditions that you can guess; and the toils were so skillfully woven that the young and healthy girl longed for her sister's sickly face and broken limb to ward off her fate. "When a whole day's work brings only a few pennies," said a prostitute to Dr. Sanger, "a smile will buy me a dinner."

No, friends; the wonder is not that so many, but that so few, fall. The great mass, spite of early influences, spite of scandalously low pay, spite of promises of future comforts and luxuries, keep their virtue. It is a grand proof of the natural purity of woman. Only when weakest, and in the most extreme cases, does she fall; and this thought suggests the true remedy for prostitution.

What is it? Why, to open to her the prospect of an honorable career. Insist that she shall have an equal chance in life with the man; that all branches of labor shall be open to her; and that it shall be as dishonorable for her not to work for some purpose as it is for man. By giving woman more self-respect, and making her more a power in the world, you strike a fatal blow at prostitution, as well as full half the evils that beset her. You must deal with the working-woman. Dainty fingers refuse to touch her; when she falls, even Christians turn the cold shoulder; and yet public virtue and private integrity hang as by a thread on her fate. The ballot as an abstract idea will not save her; Magdalen Asylums will not save her; but the practical justice which shall abolish all distinctions of sex in the world of work will do more to elevate her and purify the social state than volumes of statutes. To that sense of justice woman must appeal, not begging, but demanding, as in the educational realm, the natural rights of which she has been deprived.

The next step brings us naturally to marriage, the relation in which the principles of individual liberty have been most persistently denied. It is one of the signs of the times, at once encouraging and discouraging, that at length discussion has begun on this important subject.

Encouraging, that there are those earnest and brave enough to undertake it. Discouraging, that so many men and even more women shrink from and discountenance it in every possible way. A friend tells us that Mormon women loathe the uses to which they are put, the life of subjection they lead; and yet they are so enslaved by it that they rarely show this feeling, save in the most private manner, perhaps hardly own it to themselves. It does not occur to them to do otherwise than submit. There is a striking parallel to this fact among us. Many, probably a majority, of married women loathe certain features of the ordinary relation between husbands and wives; but it does not even occur to them that the relation is in any particular wrong. And these very women shrink from discussion. But spite of all false notions of propriety, discussion has begun. It will go on, becoming more and more general, until a purer union of the sexes shall have made its further continuance unnecessary. Whatever is corrupt in the present relation ought to be, and will be, exposed.

What then, let us ask, is true marriage? Theodore Parker said it was "a constant falling in love." Some people seem to think that marriage begins on that eventful day when the two stand up in the presence of family and friends, and the minister pronounces them one. But no words can make two one; neither can an hour, or two hours, a day, or a year. That marriage which you thought you were witnessing began months, perhaps years, before; and, if it be true, shall continue to all eternity, "a constant falling in love." It is the sublimest thing on earth,—perhaps in heaven,—the union of two souls, the wedlock of minds and hearts as well as bodies; nay, infinitely more than bodies. Plainly, such a union must have two essential characteristics, love and freedom. There can be no true love without freedom, no true freedom without love. Strictly interpreted, the grandest expression of this idea is found in the phrase, "free love." Not promiscuity,—that is slavery,—but the union of one man to one woman in love and freedom.

Such a love needs no bonds of man's device to keep it alive, and where such a love is not, there ought to be no union in form, as there certainly is none in spirit. The one fatally weak spot in marriage now is, that it is not free, unless the husband choose to make it so. "You must not do as you will, but as I will," says Herbert Spencer, "is the basis of every mandate, whether used by the planter to his negro, or by a husband to his wife." Again he says: "Command is a blight to the affections,—whatsoever of refinement, whatsoever of beauty, whatsoever of poetry there is in the passion that unites the sexes withers up and dies in the cold atmosphere of authority." When your friends who have reached middle age seem cold and stern to each other, when quarrels easily arise, and the atmosphere about them is thick with dissension, think you the love which once united their two young hearts still lives, and has grown and been purified as the years have rolled on? O no; rather has it been stunted, perhaps killed by authority.

Is it strange that it should be so? Remember the sickly thing society has made the young woman, the pernicious feeling of superiority which has arisen therefrom in the young man. They come together totally unfitted for the relation they are about to assume,—the man generally without much respect for womanhood, the woman without much respect for her own higher character and life work; and the iron bands of law are thrown around them to hold them in a forced union. Such an union thus formed and only thus sustained is a curse to the parties making it, and to society of which they are a part. It tends every hour it exists to corrupt the marriage relation, and to make it more and more a mere animal association. The result is that, if a man choose to make her so, his wife is a slave; for, not to speak of any lesser evil, he can claim from her and enforce what Stuart Mill calls "the lowest degradation of a human being, that of being made the instrument of an animal function contrary to her inclinations." We talk of the social evil with bated breath. It is a great ulcer on the body politic, sad indeed to contemplate; but there is a legalized prostitution not less bad, not less an insult to, and a corruption of, the human race. Go into families of your acquaintance where there is some invisible spectre, a something indefinite felt, though all unseen. The wife does not own her own person; she is deprived of the first of her rights. No wonder she does not respect herself. Her children see that she does not. Her husband knows that she does not. The boys learn from it to treat mother and sisters as dependents, as the father does. No wonder love cannot grow with such surroundings. The cold atmosphere of authority has taken its place.

[TO BE CONCLUDED.]

A LADY once asked C. Simeon if teachers ought always to be talking about religion. "No, no," answered the good man rather precipitately, "let your speech be seasoned with salt, madam; not a whole mouthful."

PAUL GOWER.

OF

But, mixed with these teachings, was much that was opposed to them, much that was imperfect, false and chaotic; which my own researches, as well as my friends, the sceptics, soon pointed out to me. There were miracles (of an improved character, because beneficial), inconsistencies, threats, a general assumption of supernaturalism; the incomparable Christ himself distinctly enunciated the horrible dogma of eternal punishment, which I had made away with—as if it were compatible with the rest of his doctrines. I found it in all four of the gospels—in those precious texts you commend to my consideration. But for that, I believe I might have paused and tried to effect some compromise with the record; so loth was I to break with it; so willing to be guided. The respect legitimately attaching to him clung about his ignorant biographers, and it was long before I dared to separate them, or to follow out my own convictions. But, far more than anything else, hell-fire decided me. If I accepted that, farewell to my belief in the goodness of God, without which he was no God to me. So I kept on withersomever honest inquiry led me, feeling that eternal truth ought to be able to satisfy all such questioning.

It did not cost much of a struggle to let inspiration and literal adherence go the same road with the New as the Old Testament. The narratives differed, there were contradictions, inexactitudes (two conflicting genealogies ending in Joseph, who was, notwithstanding, repudiated as the father of Jesus), beggings of the question, in attempts at reconciling fact with prophecy, expectations of an immediate end of the world—positive announcements of it (placed in his mouth) as to occur in "this generation"—all denoting human weakness and fallibility. I could not anywhere find that the writers claimed inspiration; that seemed to have been assumed subsequently; certainly in the face of important, if not overpowering, evidence to the contrary. Were God speaking, why these blunders? If the work of mortal man, what more natural? Freely I resolved to accept that conclusion, and to believe no more of the New Testament than I could reconcile with my own conscience; though, as aforesaid, it inevitably commanded infinitely more of respect and affection than the Old.

I had now to face the greatest question of all, which I must either answer or remain in the painfullest uncertainty. Who was he? what was he? this wonderful person, whose very name sounded like no other; who spake as never man spake; whose life, even seen through the imperfect medium which has come down to us, was so good as to place him, apparently, at an immeasurable distance from ordinary humanity; while, at the same time, his love appeared to comprehend most forms of it with infinite mercy, tenderness, and compassion? Was he God incarnate? From my earliest years I had been taught so, and I trembled at the seeming impety of disputing it. But why should I tremble, except at the echoes of old fears, which, thank Heaven, were extinct—in consequence of an involuntary timidity confounding religion with what I had disproved? I have already asserted that I could not fear him; at times I yearned to have lived in Judea, when he walked the earth—to have fallen at his feet and worshipped him; it seemed that I should have found peace and forgiveness, then. If I were wrong, he, who knew my heart and how earnest I was—he who prayed for those who put him to a cruel and shameful death, because it was done in ignorance—would pardon me. Nay, he bade me persevere: "Why judge ye not even of yourselves what is right?" I hesitated no longer.

The decision necessarily involved a consideration of the whole scheme of redemption, as maintained by Orthodox believers. This, ignoring the doctrine of the Trinity, which did not greatly affect me, as it was clearly incomprehensible and, therefore, I could see no merit in accepting it, may be stated as follows: That man is, by nature, since the fall of Adam, so utterly alienated from his Creator as to be righteously subject to his eternal wrath and punishment, from which there is no escape but by believing in his Son; who, though co-existent, co-powerful, and identical with him, became incarnate in the person of Jesus Christ, and was crucified by his own creatures; especially that they might believe in him and be saved. Outside the pale of that there was no redemption—no possibility of it to any human soul. I know that most people assert a larger charity than this, saying that those who have not heard the "glad tidings" will be judged by their works; but the text is clearly against them in many places. Heaven is for believers, hell for all beside.

Waiving the question of the duration of the punishment, or its character, I could not admit the justice of this. Imprimis, myriads of souls—by far the greater portion that had ever existed—were condemned arbitrarily, for no fault of their own. These included the best and most admirable natures throughout antiquity; those who seemed, as it were, to approach him, in their attempts at goodness. They were all doomed, indiscriminately with tyrants, murderers, and sensualists—there was no hope. That stamped the scheme as unjust and cruel; therefore not of God, as I conceived him. It was useless to tell me that this was none of my business; that I ought to concern myself only with selfish considerations; as aforesaid, I had a right to bring everything to bear on the subject; if it were what it pretended to be, it would emerge triumphant from all questioning. It did not do so in this instance.

Secondly, of those who had heard, how many, or rather, how few, would be saved? Omitting the explicit testimony of the Bible, which, over and over again, pronounced the number of the elect to be infinitely small, it was generally taken for granted, and all observation confirmed the fact, that the vast majority of those who claimed to be Christians and believers were only nominally such; being mere worldlings, intent on the affairs of this life; whose tacit conformity with religion would, its stricter votaries declared, avail them nothing—nay, rather heap upon them greater damnation than the heathen, because they had neglected their opportunities. The fulfilment of their duties could not help them; that was “filthy rags” and “self-righteousness.” Here, again, I joined issue. I could not believe in the dogmas of original sin and total depravity (the idea that we were all corrupt because Adam and Eve had eaten an apple was too absurd for consideration). I felt that we might be infinitely better than we were—that there was a great deal of sin and suffering in the world; but, also, that we were not wholly bad; else why should we desire to amend? If evil were our natural element, we should feel quite at home in it, instead of uneasy and unhappy, and longing for deliverance. (The mystery of the existence of the evil, at all, I, of course, found insolvable, and could only reconcile myself to it by supposing that it worked out a great end—was a means towards something higher in the scale of being than mere good, alone, could have accomplished.) Boldly I determined that goodness must be acceptable to God, even when unaccompanied by belief, and that if the latter were indispensable he would not have made it irrational also; that is to say, conflicting with our ideas of right and justice, which, however limited, must, to their poor extent, coincide with his own; because they were of his creation. Besides, the eternal casting away of the greater part of the human race, under any circumstances, involves either injustice or a failure in his scheme, and therefore implies a denial of his goodness or power; on both of which I relied as fundamental facts, impossible to be disputed. Nor does it at all affect the argument to urge that it is their own fault (which, in the case of the heathen, I have already disproved), but only shifts the responsibility to another count. How had they deserved being subjected to such a risk? For who, with a choice, would have accepted existence (not an unalloyed one here, either) on the terms?

Thirdly (and lastly, in this connection), the salvation of the elect only by faith seemed to me as objectionable as the reprobation of the indifferent or ignorant. I know you will quote, “Faith without works is dead,” but I put it to your own candor and experience whether, in all “Evangelical preaching,” as it is called, the first is not allowed to eclipse the second, even to total obscuration? And there are texts enough and to spare in support of this: I have already quoted some of them. Hear what an uncanonical writer named Fielding has to say on the subject, as it exactly expresses my opinion: “Can anything be more derogatory to the honor of God, than for men to imagine that the all-wise Being will hereafter say to the good and virtuous, ‘Notwithstanding the purity of thy life, notwithstanding that constant rule of virtue and goodness in which thou walkedst upon earth, still, as thou didst not believe everything in the true Orthodox manner, thy want of faith shall condemn thee.’ Or, on the other side, can any doctrine have a more pernicious influence on society than a persuasion that it will be a good plea for a villain, at the last day: ‘Lord, it is true I never obeyed one of thy commandments; yet punish me not, for I believe them all!’” Such an expectation, in fact, less puny than stated, often accompanies a murderer to the gallows, and dismisses him in a state of spiritual ecstasy, rather than heart-broken repentance. It does worse—it makes lies bad; allows people to think that they can be mean, selfish, hard, cruel, and yet “believe and be saved.” For it is notorious that religious people, as they are denominated, are not kinder or better than others—of which I shall have more to say presently.

All this made wild work with the narrow, partial, and un-Christian scheme of redemption, but I could not pause; having ascertained the injustice of the plan in its results to humanity, it now behooved me to consider it solely as attributed to the Almighty. Postponing the question of Christ's divinity, was it right that the innocent should suffer for the guilty—that such an expiation should be demanded or compelled with? Humanly speaking, no; for what should we say of an earthly parent who crucified his most virtuous and best-beloved child for the sake of reprobates—especially when it was entirely optional with him to forgive them as freely as the father did the repentant prodigal in the blessed parable? To be consistent with what we are taught, he should first have slain his eldest born, in obedience to the savage maxim: “Without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins.” Indeed, the doctrine is Jewish, the parable Christian; therein lies the essential difference. Do not try and stop my mouth with “His ways are not our ways,” but remember they are those “of truth and righteousness.” Again, I could not see the justice of the atonement.

Then, was it likely that he, the creator of worlds upon worlds, systems beyond systems, to inconceivable infinity, should assume human form, in order to live and die obscurely in a corner of one planet (which must be as an atom of dust compared to the awful totality), in accordance with a covenant, exclusively accredited to one narrow-minded, barbarous, and bigoted people; that the event, imperfectly and confusedly recorded, should produce such incredible and partial consequences? His ways should be consistent with what we know of his works, his glory, and omnipotence. It did not seem so in this instance. If there were intelligent inhabitants in the starry orbs above us—which I, for one, thought more than probable—what was their religion? We could not fancy the same scheme of redemption repeated in each of them—that were impious burlesque; but the religion of such a creator—theirs and ours—should be as suitable to them as to us—absolute, universal, eternal. In fact, just such a religion as Jesus Christ declared to be all that was necessary to salvation—Love to God and to each other.

We cannot but suppose an infinite distance between God and man; the most orthodox of believers unconsciously make a distinction in their preference of the Son to the Father; in the relegation of all the vengeful characteristics to the latter, the beautiful ones to the former. Why this, if in their minds both are identical? Inquire, and you shall find the indefiniteness that must accrue from the attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable. (The explicitness of the Athanasian Creed, “not made, nor created, but begotten,” is impious and shocking beyond expression; everybody conspires to ignore it, nobody daring to face its plain meaning.) People have, in truth, so desecrated the Almighty in their imaginations that they cannot love him, but are fain to take refuge from the frightful and monstrous abstraction of their own fears and superstitions in the person of Jesus Christ. The time will come—is not, perhaps, far distant—when they will recognize in the fatherliness of the one the highest of his attributes; in the declaration of it, by the other, his strongest title to our gratitude and admiration.

Thus justice, probability, and instinct were all arrayed against the supernatural part of the scheme; nor was the record, when closely looked into, even half in favor of it; nor harmonious, coherent, nor satisfactory. In the first three Gospels one finds nothing whatever of the Messiahship: they are altogether different from the fourth, which, offensively obtruding that especial dogma in certain portions, does so at the cost of all verisimilitude with the others, representing Jesus Christ as proud, partial, severe, narrow-minded, and intolerant—in a word, inferior to, and almost utterly unlike, the Christ we love to believe in. I did not then know that none of these Gospels (themselves selected from a vast number of rejected ones, nearly three centuries after the crucifixion) were written or compiled long subsequent to the events they treat of: that their text is corrupt, conflicting, and imperfect: that the fourth, in particular (attributed to John on purely arbitrary grounds), has the least pretensions to historical accuracy: nor that the divinity of Jesus was an open question, from the Apostles' time till nearly seven hundred years afterwards, when the “heresy” contradicting it was “extirpated” by the sword. I say I did not then know of these things; and it was only when I searched further (in my cousin's library at Thorpe Parva and elsewhere) that I discovered the truth; and understood on what a slender foundation such a gigantic superstition had been erected—though always protested against, through all the ages, by some of the best men (aye, and churchmen!) who have ever lived. The facts are patent to everybody who cares to inquire for himself, and is not merely acquiescent—one of the great crowd of conventional believers—blank Bibliolaters—word-worshippers—in servile bondage to the letter—who can give no reason for the faith that is in them, but the pitiful one that the majority is on their side—an argument which, in Christ's time, would have justified his murder. For, be it remarked, doubt is an indispensable preliminary to intelligent conviction; and he who never examined cannot rationally believe. Your hereditary religion has no better basis than that of a Turk or Hindu, and much more in common with them than you are aware of.

But the record, as it stood, furnished sufficient evidence of the humanity of Jesus, as distinguished from his divinity. Not to instance his never speaking of his conception and birth as being supernatural, or the denial or imperfect credence of his Messiahship by his brethren and the Apostles, even in the face of asserted miraculous proofs of it, many of his words and actions are against that assumption. We are told that he grew in favor with God and man; that he declared himself to be less than his Father—nay, even refused the compliment of excellence above others. What do you say to these words, to be found in all but that last and least truthful of the Gospels?

“And he said unto him, ‘Why callest thou Me good? There is none good but God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.’”

What is the meaning of this, if not the honest, straightforward one implied by the text? Nothing but the most miserable special pleading, and such begging the question as is an insult to the understanding, can make it agree with the Orthodox belief of Christendom. It is the expression of a devout soul, conscious of God's infinite superiority to his creatures, and directing us heavenward. Again, he prays to him to be spared death, is tempted, discouraged—despairing almost—in short, subject to mortal weaknesses and infirmities. How should God be tempted? how cast down? how ignorant of the date of the day of judgment, at which he is to preside? and which, as we have seen, he asserted would take place in his time—before the men of that generation should be gathered to their fathers. Then he speaks of a personal devil—an absurdity so gross that even the clergy are shy of alluding to it now-a-days—and, as aforesaid, of hell and the unpardonable sin. Can anybody read the Gospels candidly, and not discover these things, and their obvious deduction? It may be that God permitted these errors, that in his own good time—when men were able to bear the truth—the arbitrary husk inclosing it should be exploded.

There yet remained another consideration—to my thinking the most important of all—his character. I have already told you how that affected me, and notwithstanding what I have just mentioned, and other discrepancies, it was long—years—before I attained peace on the subject, and absolute conviction. Were such high and heavenly utterances, such greatness, such goodness, such a life, and such a death, merely mortal? Familiar from my childhood with the cant of “total depravity,” I had not faith enough in humanity to think so. The miracles didn't trouble me much: I could have accepted them as appendages to him, only they seemed wrong, as making God interfere with his own majestic and far more wonderful laws, for mere temporary purposes, which, after all, accomplished very little, even in their own day—for, in the most remarkable of them, the widow's son, Jairus' daughter, and Lazarus, must have died in the long run, hence what availed the few brief years gained by their resuscitation? If you say these miracles occurred in evidence of his divinity, I answer that they did not convert the Jews (who even wished to kill Lazarus); and it is doubly illogical to ask us to believe them on the unauthenticated authority of the record. Then we do not scruple to deny modern miracles, though they are attested by living witnesses. But, as I say, they seemed unworthy of him; though I scarcely knew why. Will you hear him who told me, and set me at rest on the subject? then listen to the greatest and most spiritual of American writers, Ralph Waldo Emerson:—

“Jesus Christ belonged to the true race of prophets. He saw with open eye the mystery of the soul. Drawn by its severe harmony, ravished with its beauty, he lived in it and had his being there. Alone in all history, he estimated the greatness of man. One man was true to what is in you and me. He saw that God incarnates himself in man, and evermore goes forth anew to take possession of his world. He said, in this jubilee of sublime emotion, ‘I am divine. Through me God acts; through me, speaks. Would you see God, see me; or see thee, when thou shouldst think as I now think.’ But what a distortion did his doctrine and memory suffer in the same, in the next, and the following ages! There is no doctrine of the Reason which will bear to be taught by the understanding. The understanding caught this high chant from the poet's lips, and said, in the next age, ‘This was Jehovah come down out of heaven. I will kill you if you say he was a man.’ The idioms of his language, and the figures of his rhetoric, have usurped the place of his truth; and churches are not built on his principles, but on his tropes. Christianity became a Mythos, as the poetic teaching of Greece and of Egypt were. He spoke of miracles; for he felt that man's life was a miracle, and all that man doth, and he knew that this daily miracle shines, as the man is divine. But the very word miracle, as pronounced by Christian churches, gives a false impression; it is monstrous. It is not one with the blowing clover and the falling rain. . . .

“By this Eastern monarchy of a Christianity, which indolence and fear have built, the friend of man is made the injurer of man. The manner in which his name is surrounded with expressions which were once sallies of admiration and love, but are now petrified into official titles, kills all generous sympathy and liking. All who hear me feel that the language that describes Christ to Europe and America is not the style of friendship and enthusiasm to a good and noble heart, but is appropriated and formal—paints a demigod, as the Orientals or the Greeks would describe Osiris or Apollo. . . .

“The divine words are the friends of my virtue, of my intellect, of my strength. They admonish me that the gleams which flash across my mind are not mine, but God's; that they had the like and were not disobedient to the heavenly vision. So I love them. Noble provocations go out from them, inviting me also to emancipate myself; to resist evil; to subdue the world; and to be. And thus, by his holy thought, Jesus serves us, and thus only. To aim to convert a man by miracles is a profanation of the soul. A true conversion, a true Christ, is now, as always, to be made by the reception of beautiful sentiments. It is true that a great and rich soul, like his, falling among the simple, does so preponderate that, as he did, it names the world. The world seems to exist for him, and they have not yet drunk so deeply of his sense as to see that only by coming again to themselves, or to God in themselves, can they grow forevermore. It is a low benefit to give me something; it is a high benefit to enable me to do somewhat of myself. The time is coming when all men will see that the gift of God to the soul is not a vaunting, overpowering, excluding sanctity, but a sweet, natural goodness, a goodness like thine and mine, and that so invites mine and thine to be and to grow.”

THACKERAY tells us of a woman begging alms from him, who, when she saw him put his hand in his pocket, cried out, “May the blessings of God follow you all your life!” But when he only pulled out his snuff-box she immediately added, “And never overtake ye!”

INFIDELITY RAMPANT--RELIGIOUS RADICALISM.

[From the Daily Statesman, of Austin, Texas, Nov. 1.]

There has lately been held in the city of New York a meeting of an Association called "The Free Religion Association," devoted to what its members designate as free religion. It was held in the large hall of the Cooper Union, which the Tribune says was "two-thirds filled with an audience of a high order of intelligence." The meeting was presided over by a Mr. Charles Storrs, of Brooklyn, and the Rev. (?) O. B. Frothingham made a very long address on the occasion. We have read the Tribune's report of this speech and must confess ourselves somewhat startled by its revelations. We were aware that infidelity had progressed to an alarming extent in the Northern States, but we had no idea of the boldness and audacity with which it is being avowed and inculcated. Free Religion, according to Mr. Frothingham, is no religion at all, so far as the Bible is concerned. It is purely a religion of Nature, without any Bible or Savior or God of the universe. It is, as this reverend infidel explained it, the religion of science. We give an extract from his closing remarks, on the first day. Speaking of his faith, he says: "The result will be a gospel of kindness, a religion of humanity, natural philanthropy, social reform, social science, the deification of charity, the worship of culture, reports instead of liturgies, politics instead of prayers!" The benediction, which followed this extraordinary sermon of the Rev. Frothingham, was in keeping with his faith. It was "I bid you good evening." And we say, "Good-night to Mormonism," and the reverend infidel O. B. Frothingham. But this gentleman was not alone in his glory of trying to overturn nearly nineteen hundred years of Christianity. There were other reverend gentlemen, so-called, who were present, or who wrote letters approving the object of the meeting. There was the Rev. Mr. Gannett, of Boston, the Rev. Wm. J. Potter, of New Bedford, the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, and many literary celebrities, such as James Parton, Henry B. Blackwell, Francis E. Abbot, Professor E. L. Youmans and Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, all of whose productions our Southern youth are reading in the Northern magazines. It is well enough, we think, for them to be informed what sort of literature they are encouraging. There were also letters read from Charles Bradlaugh, the English radical, now in this country, and from Gerrit Smith of old abolition memory, Judge Hoadly, of Cincinnati, William Lloyd Garrison, and even old Peter Cooper himself. On the third and last day of this remarkable convention of reverend and literary infidels, Mr. Frothingham made a good deal of fun out of the great revival which took place some years ago in Boston, and the irreverent Chadwick said that "God created the heavens and earth and there was an end of it, except a very few times he had to interfere and try to mend in some way the great world machine, which had not somehow gone satisfactorily." These free religious jokers seem to have had a jolly time. As usual on such gatherings at the North, there were some semi-women present, who read essays and made speeches. Mrs. A. B. Blackwell and Mrs. Mary F. Davis among the number. The Rev. W. J. Potter, as evidence of the progress of the "free religion" among the churches, said that in his own society at New Bedford, the ordinances of baptism and the communion had been discontinued. As Frothingham began the infidel exercises of the convention, so he ended them by asserting, that "the wildest dream cherished to-day, was the dream of the Christian Church, and the most audacious dreamer was Jesus of Nazareth." "How long, O Lord, how long?" Every one of these impious infidels are radicals of the deepest dye.

PROSCRIPTION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

On the 16th day of this month (December), the people of Pennsylvania will be called upon to vote for the adoption or rejection of a new Constitution, which, among other clauses in what is styled the "Declaration of Rights," contains the following: "No person who acknowledges the being of a God and a future state of rewards and punishments shall on account of his religious sentiments be disqualified to hold any office or place of trust or profit under this Commonwealth." All persons, therefore, who do not acknowledge those dogmas are disqualified. We, as American citizens, in our spread-eagle Fourth of July orations, are very much in the habit of boasting of our free government, where all classes of citizens stand on an equality before the law; we invite people of other nations, who are oppressed and find their freedom of conscience interfered with by their rulers, to come to us and partake with us the blessings of civil and religious liberty. Under the Constitution of the United States, entire freedom is the birthright of every one born on its soil, and no human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the right of conscience. No preference can ever be given by United States law to any religious establishment or special mode of worship. Yet this new Constitution to be submitted as a whole to the people of Pennsylvania, without any opportunity to reject such parts as do not meet their approbation, contains a clause disqualifying a very large and respectable body of the most intelligent citizens in the State, on account of their conscientious disbelief in the Christian doctrine of future punishment. It really seems unaccountable that men intelligent enough to frame a Constitution for the great State of Pennsylvania should so stultify themselves as to insert a provision of that kind. Since when have these wisecracks discovered that a man's theological opinions have anything to do with his qualifications for holding an office, or that men's opinions are mere matters of choice? The public are generally discriminating enough to select men to represent them in an official station on account of their capacity, not on account of their private religious opinions. Men's honest opinions on religion, politics, and other subjects, are often beyond their control, and force themselves upon them according to the natural bias of their minds. It has not been always customary in the history of our country to select men for important positions on account of their sound Orthodox theology, or certainly such men as Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin would never have occupied the positions that an appreciative public awarded them. Neither of them made any secret of their disbelief of the doctrine of future punishment. Such a clause in the Constitution of any State in the Union should be treated as a dead letter; for should a test case be made and taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, that court could not with any consistency declare a provision of that character Constitutional, conflicting as it does with the spirit of the Constitution of the United States, which entirely ignores everything of a theological nature, and requires no religious tests from any of its officials.

Copies of the subjoined petition will be sent from THE INDEX Office to any address, on receipt of a three cent postage stamp. All interested in the repeal of the Act of Congress designated will please circulate this petition for signatures; and all lists returned to THE INDEX will be acknowledged in its columns.—Ed.

We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of the United States, would hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal the first section of the Act approved June 17, 1870, entitled "An Act exempting from taxes certain property in the District of Columbia," etc., and providing that "all churches and school-houses, and all buildings, grounds and property appurtenant thereto, and used in connection therewith, in the District of Columbia, shall be exempt from any and all taxes and assessments, national, municipal or county." We ask this for the following reasons:—

1. This part of said Act we understand to be at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Since the exemption from taxation of churches, parsonages, ecclesiastical houses and sectarian schools in the District of Columbia is precisely equivalent in effect to a direct appropriation by Congress for their support, we conceive this measure to violate what all the exponents of the Constitution declare to have been its manifest intent and design,—namely, to sever all religious organizations from any connection with or dependence upon the civil government, except for equal and impartial protection. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

2. This part of said Act we conceive to be also contrary to equity and justice, inasmuch as its effect is to increase our relative proportion of the National taxes, to the end of relieving altogether from taxation certain churches and church properties in the District of Columbia. We consider it, therefore, to be UNJUST.

3. All history shows that the effect of exempting churches from taxation is to accumulate property in the hands of ecclesiastical bodies to a very dangerous extent, and at last to compel resort to confiscation as the only means of escaping the great evils thus generated. The examples of England, of Italy, and of Mexico, of Spain, Austria, and France, are sufficient warnings against adopting a policy which is hostile to American ideas and American institutions. That the non-taxation of church property is tending to the same results here as elsewhere is evident from the fact that, while the number of church-members in the United States was not doubled between 1850 and 1870, the value of church property during the same period was quadrupled, advancing from $87,328,801 to $354,483,581. At the same rate, its value in 1890 will be over $1,418,000,000; and such rapid accumulation of wealth in ecclesiastical hands is most perilous to civil and religious liberty. This part of said Act, therefore, we consider to be UNSAFE.

For the reasons, consequently, that this part of said Act is unconstitutional, unjust, and unsafe, we respectfully ask that it be forthwith repealed.

THE NOVEL EXPERIMENT instituted by President Grant of mixing Church with State in Indian affairs, and designating through the Interior Department the various paths to salvation which the different tribes must pursue, does not in all cases work satisfactorily. The Osage Indians, who are Catholics, have been turned over to the supervision of Quaker missionaries, and they are very much dissatisfied with the change. A memorial to the President has been prepared and signed by the principal chiefs, in which they say they have frequently petitioned the authorities to return to them their Catholic missionaries, but their wish has not been gratified. They say the Catholic priests came to live among them in 1844, and have always been regarded as their fathers; that they would never have signed the treaty of 1865 if it had not been fully understood that their Catholic priests were to remain with them, educate their children, and aid them with advice. They complain that the experience of the last four years has proved that the religious teachers who have been forced upon them cannot command the respectful obedience of the young men and children, and say that the present officers and missionaries are suspected of seeking self-interest and wasting their annuities. The memorial closes with an appeal to the President to give them back their Catholic instructors, promising if this is done that their children shall be sent to school. They think that they have a right to choose their own religion and select their own teachers, as only their own money is involved in the expense. The Osages have a large education fund.—New York Sun.

WINTER, AND A GRAVE.

Thou little brook that croon'st as blithely
Between thy frozen, snow-heaped banks,
As when the apple trees were blooming,
And bee and bird were giving thanks!

Well mayst thou sing, e'en in the winter,
And strive to cheer me with thy pranks,
Since April's grass will soon be springing,
And violets clustering on thy banks.

I too might keep a gladsome current
Aye rippling through this gloomy heart,
If, after long and dreary winter,
The spring could bid my blossoms start.

Thou singest to me of past joys only,
Of summers that will come no more,
Leaf, blossom, bird-song, love-light, vanished,
And I alone on a wintry shore.

And ever, as thou journeyest onward
To the river flowing silently,
I think of one who vanished from me,
Aye, lost in death's deep mystery.

Ah, could that seeming deathless spirit
Sometimes revisit these dear haunts,
And I might know what once was human Still shares with me dear human wants,—

Still hungers for the old communion,
Methinks such knowledge would be sweet,
And midst hope's rapturous resurrection
My heart with swiftest tides would beat.

Alas! thy ceaseless flow and murmur
But voice the grief within my breast,
Through summer, winter, winter, summer,
An endless sorrow, a fruitless quest.

CASH PREMIUMS FOR 1874.

In order to increase the circulation of THE INDEX, and thereby make it a more powerful instrumentality in the reform to which it is devoted, the following Cash Premiums are now offered:—

1. THE INDEX will pay to any one of its old subscribers $1.00 for every new subscription of $3.00 obtained by his or her means and forwarded to this office. If preferred, the $1.00 may be deducted before remitting. This offer holds good for new subscriptions alone, and not for renewals.

2. In addition to this, it offers One Hundred Dollars to the person who shall send the largest list of new subscribers, with the money, before the first day of February, 1874, and Fifty Dollars to the person sending the next largest list during the same time.

There are many warm friends of THE INDEX throughout the country who would be glad to help increase its circulation, if they could only afford to give their time to the work. The above offers will enable them to do so. Supposing that the largest list sent contains one hundred new names, the sender will be entitled to $100.00 as commission and another $100.00 as premium. Will not many of our lady subscribers, who are the most efficient of all canvassers, seize this opportunity to help THE INDEX without too great a sacrifice on their own part?

GLIMPSES.

WE HAVE HAD a surfeit of radical words; give us now a radical deed!

IT IS A LOSS to you to lose faith in your brother's virtue. You cannot afford to lessen the world's stock of goodness. If you are forced to credit a revelation of guilt, you have less goodness to believe in; if you make haste to credit a slander, you have less goodness to believe with.

MR. MORSE'S bust of Theodore Parker excites great admiration among those who knew him personally. It is full of life and character, and proves no ordinary genius in the artist. Ten dollars is a very low price for such a noble memento of one of the noblest of men. We hope that Mr. Morse will find abundant encouragement from all who can appreciate the excellence of his work.

WE HAVE had prepared a number of handsome placards, printed with colored inks on thick Bristol boards, for gratuitous distribution, to such News-Dealers as are willing to hang them up conspicuously in their stands. Please ask your own news-dealer whether he will hang one up near his counter, if sent. We shall be happy to forward it to his address. This little service, which will cost our friends very little trouble to render, may be of great value to THE INDEX.

IT MAY NOT be generally known that the Catholics of this country are forming an organization with objects analogous to those of the Protestant "Young Men's Christian Association." It is a branch of a European organization designed to influence public opinion in favor of supporting the Pope and all his pretensions, old and new, and to advance in all respects the peculiar interests of the Roman Catholic faith. Under the name of the "Catholic Union," it is intended to organize the Catholic laity under the complete control of the Catholic priesthood; and such Unions have already been formed in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. The Boston Catholic Union was organized about a year ago, with the full approval of the Bishop of the diocese, and held its first public meeting at Music Hall in this city on Nov. 14. Five Bishops and about a hundred priests were present, besides the immense audience. The opening speech was made by Mr. Theodore Metcalf, President of the Union, who read the Address sent by the Union to the Pope last May; and Mr. Pelletier read the Pope's reply, dated July 23, 1873. Mr. Henry L. Richards then stated the objects of the Union, and the following extracts, though copious, should receive the closest attention:—

"The object of the Catholic Union cannot, perhaps, be better expressed than in the terse and comprehensive language of the first article of our Constitution:

"The Catholic Union of Boston is formed under the inspiration of the words of Our Most Holy Father, Pius IX., recommending union and organization of the Catholic laity in the spirit of loyalty to the Church. Its objects are to defend and promote Catholic interests, to maintain a spirit of devotion to the Holy Father, and to promote by all proper means a spirit of reverence for his rights, both spiritual and temporal." Observe we are an association of Catholic laymen, acting under the inspiration of the Holy Father, the highest authority in the Church, with the sanction and approval of our own beloved Bishop. We are not an irresponsible association with ambitious political aspirations or quixotic schemes of moral reform. We have a legitimate end to aim at, a definite work, as it were, put into our hands, and it is our pride and our glory, as it is the guarantee of our safety and the augury of our success to act in concert with and under the advice and counsel of our spiritual superiors. We wish to demonstrate to the world the falsity and utter groundlessness of the impression which has been attempted to be created in certain quarters, that Catholic laymen look with suspicion upon the movements of their clergy. We utterly scout the idea that the Catholic hierarchy are seeking self-aggrandizement,—the exaltation of their order at the expense of the rights of the laity. The Catholic Union is but too happy to respond to the suggestions of the Holy Father, by showing to the world that the laity are in perfect harmony with the clergy. There is but one party in the Church, one interest, one common bond that unites all in loving accord in the same holy faith, seeking the same glorious end. The whole spirit of our association would lead us to frown indignantly upon the first dawning of an attempt to alienate any portion of the laity from the most complete loyalty, the most hearty devotion to our splendid hierarchy. Especially do our hearts kindle with enthusiasm at the very mention of the venerable name of the illustrious Pontiff who now occupies the chair of Peter and administers the affairs of the Church as its glorious head; the grandest figure of the age in which we live. Persecuted and despised, as he is by the world, we are proud to be called his children, and we should esteem it a high honor to devote our lives to the defence of his rights and the exaltation of his prerogatives.

"Under the head of Catholic interests which our Constitution pledges us to defend, there are some questions of serious importance which will necessarily engage the attention of our Union, and in which, as time goes on, we hope by judicious and persevering effort to be successful. I refer now principally to the important question of Catholic education, and to our rights in our public institutions of charity and correction.

"Finally we are organized for the defence of the rights of the Sovereign Pontiff. These rights are two-fold: 1. The rights of St. Peter as head of the Church, and—2. The rights of the principality of the States of the Church as head of the State.

"There is undoubtedly a widespread conspiracy to rule God out of society. This they hope to accomplish by exalting Caesar in the place of Christ, by subjecting the Church to the State, and by substituting godless education, compulsory if need be, for that good old-fashioned, dogmatic Christian teaching and culture which is the only sure basis of morality, and, therefore, the only security for the good order and well-being of society. For this they are organizing all over the world, laboring with ceaseless vigilance and untiring energy for the accomplishment of their nefarious purpose. We must be prepared to meet them on their own ground, not, indeed, with the weapons of carnal warfare, not with hatred and bitterness, not with retaliation of bigotry and intolerance; but our warfare is a warfare of reason, of argument, of persuasion. It should be a confederacy of holy charity, a contest of love against hatred, of patience under insult, of forgiveness of injury, but, at the same time, of a bold, fearless, manly maintenance of principle, and assertion of the right, the just, and the true.

"We want no compromise in this contest, no weak-kneed, vacillating, half-hearted attachment. 'Thank God! Gallicanism is dead; having been killed by the decrees of the great Council of the Vatican. And 'liberal Catholicism,' which is animated by the same spirit and seeks the same end, has been marked and proscribed by the Holy Father. A liberal Catholic is too often a man who is ashamed of his religion and has not the courage to be consistent."

THE RELIGIOUS ENVIRONMENT.

It is a marked tendency of modern science to seek the explanation of biological, sociological, historical, and even biographical phenomena in the influence of surrounding circumstances or outward conditions of various sorts, all of which are summed up in what Comte styles the "medium" (milieu) and Spencer the "environment." The development of individual organisms, of species, of institutions, of nations, of character, is traced more and more to the action of climatic or other general agencies, operating to produce external or internal changes by insensible steps in everything of which development can be predicated. This tendency is so pronounced as, in our opinion, to run into excess,—to prevent the recognition of any peculiar manifestation of force in organic life which cannot be ultimately reduced to the ordinary action of cosmical influences, and thus to enlarge the boundaries of physics until it swallows up and digests all the other sciences. Herbert Spencer's philosophy exhibits this tendency in its full strength, proposing as it does to state all problems and their solutions in mechanical terms. We look, however, for the correction of this excessive tendency sooner or later by the recognition of a true gradation in all manifestations of force, each distinct science being perceived to involve conceptions peculiar to itself and irreducible to the conceptions of any other science. When this natural reaction takes place, the danger of overlooking the part played in all development by the special constitution or individuality of that which is developed will be escaped, and the higher sciences, such as sociology and ethics, will no longer be cramped by the futile attempt to solve their peculiar problems by eliminating everything which is peculiar to them.

Now the general tendency here noted to secure adequate appreciation for the action of the environment in all cases of evolution, which runs even to excess in the more advanced schools of modern thought, has not begun to be felt at all in ordinary thinking on religious subjects. Even radicalism itself has hitherto looked almost exclusively at the fact of individualism, as if the growth of the individual were quite independent of general causes, and could be wholly controlled by the individual himself,—as if he could take into his own hands his own fate, irrespective of the laws which confine his power of self-determination within exceedingly narrow bounds. The fact is that what we are depends chiefly on what the society is in which we are reared. We imbibed opinions, purposes, ideals, at every pore. No man, however original or self-centred, can escape this suction into himself of circumambient fluids. To some small extent we do indeed preside over our own destiny, carve our own future, control our own culture. But we breathe a social atmosphere which poisons or oxygenates the blood of our entire system, and thus carries life or death to every remotest cell of our moral organism. The key-note of American radicalism was pitched by Emerson decades ago, in his doctrine of the autocracy of the selfhood over its own career. As a tonic immensely needed by an over-imitative people, with whom too often the vote of the majority is the voice of God, this doctrine has been most salutary. But it needs to be qualified by the doctrine of science that the environment exerts an enormous influence over the individual, in spite of himself. What the world about us is, that will most certainly be reported in our characters and our lives; and he who wishes to ensure a grander humanity in the succeeding age is fatuous, unless he attempts to change for the better the general conditions of life among which it is to be educated.

In this fact, which no one who is imbued with modern scientific thought will question, lies the strongest vindication of that policy of reform which aims at immediate results in social or political changes. Such efforts will be often very unwise, if they are not grounded on a broad and deep knowledge of man; and especially if they aim at a positive management of society rather than the mere abolition of unnatural restrictions. But efforts directed primarily at effecting such a change in the social environment as shall purify the atmosphere from known poisons, and give men oxygen to breathe instead of foul exhalations, are the wisest of all reformatory activities. They render true progress certain, not only for individuals here and there, but for all society at large. An improved social environment means an improved humanity in the next generation. Radicalism is unscientific when it expects to regenerate the world by preaching new motives under old conditions. The new motives are all-important; but they demand new conditions. They must have new conditions, or they cannot widely prevail. The nearest possible approach of society to the free individualism of Emersonian radicalism must be secured by the Spencerian method of ameliorating the social environment. In other words, to get a finer human harvest, you must weed and enrich the soil in which it is to grow. Nature will do the rest.

The prime condition of ennobling the religious character of mankind, if what we have said is true, consists in purifying the environment in the midst of which this character must grow. To-day the religious environment is in large measure ecclesiasticism, sectarianism, theology of a specifically Christian type,—denominationalism supported and maintained by privileges conferred by the State. A great system of church domination over the minds of men, which draws subsidies from the universal community by the iniquity of exemption from just taxation, weighs on humanity like a mill-stone; and there is no possibility of a general advance till this general burden is thrown off. Vast as is the importance of proclaiming a purer religion to individuals, vaster still is the importance of providing a freer religious environment for them. A lighted candle goes out, if plunged into a jar of carbonic acid; and the light of the purest religion is extinguished in the "fixed air" of ecclesiasticism. All we desire for Free Religion is "a fair field and no favor;" and to secure this is the primary object of the Liberal League. When the special "Demands of Liberalism" are all conceded, Christianity will simply stand on a footing of civil equality with all other types of religious belief. To purify the religious environment by the abolition of all ecclesiastical privilege is the first duty of radicalism to-day; and then, whatever is the truth, the essential condition of its final victory will have been established.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association have established an office for the Association at No. 1 Tremont Place, Boston. For business convenience and economy the office has been arranged in the rooms of the "Index Association;" but there is no other alliance between the two associations, and no responsibility of either for the other.

The publications of the Association are on sale at the office, and membership fees and other donations can be paid there if persons wish to do so.

It will be seen by reference to our new advertisement in the advertising columns that several of the back Annual Reports and other publications can now be secured. The Boston fire destroyed most of our published matter, so that of Reports prior to 1872, and of the Sympathy of Religions and Religions of China, we have only a limited number of copies, that were in the hands of friends of the Association; consequently the prices of these have been put somewhat higher than formerly.

The Essay by James Parton on Taxation of Church Property is now ready in tract form. It is a most timely publication and should be put into the hands especially of Congressmen, and members of State Legislatures, and of Constitutional Conventions. The larger part of the first edition has already been ordered for such distribution.

A number of persons who became members of the Association at the Annual Meeting last May, and are therefore entitled to this year's Report, have possibly not received it, because no post-office address stood against their names on the Treasurer's books. If any such persons will notify the Secretary, New Bedford, Mass., sending their address, the Report will be forwarded to them.

MEDIATORS AND MEDIUMS.

A writer of distinguished reputation among the Spiritualists, for his intellectual strength, finds fault with that portion of an address on "The Religious Outlook in America," which relates to Spiritualism, on the ground that it makes an issue between Spiritualism and Christianity precisely where it should show a sympathy. The author, he says, represents Spiritualism as fundamentally opposed to the doctrine of Mediation, the central doctrine of Christianity—whereas this is the one cardinal point wherein the two systems of faith concur. Is not the doctrine of Mediation cardinal with Spiritualism too? he asks. It is founded on the fact of mediumship, and mediumship is mediation. The two words have the same root and the same import.

We cannot but express surprise that a writer and thinker so practised as LeRoy Sunderland should allow himself to be deceived by a superficial analogy. How can we explain it? Certainly not by any desire on his part to propitiate the popular sentiment of the Christian community. He is wholly above that. Yet it seems impossible that he can have failed to think below the surface of his words, or have missed the ultimate significance of ideas that stand so plainly out in the avowed beliefs of mankind.

To our mind, the terms mediumship and mediation, as used in the respective vocabularies, are as strongly contrasted as it is possible for terms to be. They convey mutually excluding doctrines; they assume opposite schemes of philosophy. The cardinal thought of Spiritualism is that the barrier that divided the visible from the invisible, or, as they are commonly called, the material and the spiritual worlds, is removed, and free communication established between the dwellers below and the dwellers above. The medium is the agent through whom this communication is effected, the interpreter of it, the messenger who brings it, the bond of correspondence—the genial go-between, the friendly middle-man, the intervening tie or link; a neutral person, qualified by some physical or moral peculiarity to receive and transmit influence from one sphere to another.

The cardinal thought of Christianity is that the barrier which divides the lower world from the upper is insurmountable except by the supreme being; that a great gulf separates the inhabitants of a world of sin from the inhabitants of a world of glory. The Mediator is the person—and there is only one—divinely commissioned to bear terms of forgiveness from the offended King to the alienated subjects.

The medium has no sacrificial function, is not in any sense an intercessor or reconciler. What should he reconcile? The two spheres are not hostile, but in cordial sympathy and union. They are essentially one and the same. He merely reports and effectuates an established amity. The mediator on the other hand is a redeemer, a savior who, by special authority and by peculiar means, procures admission for outcasts into the region of felicity. The distinction will be obvious to anybody who will take a popular enumeration of the offices of the Christ, such as any hymn-book contains, and set it along side of the perfectly familiar class of functions which mediums of every rank perform. There is not a single office shared between them, unless it be that of communicating a message; and even there, the essentially different character of the message brought, as regards import, purpose, the implied disposition of the parties corresponding, and the final result of the intercourse, deprives the acts of all resemblance. No "Christian" would admit, for an instant, an analogy, even, between the mediation which opens a way of deliverance from sin, and the exchange of service by which the interests of a community are held together, the correspondence of friends by mediation of the post-office, the intervention of middle men, of all kinds, in the transactions of the market, the parts performed by letter-carriers, telegraph-operators, newsboys, scribes, who simply facilitate communication between persons living remote from one another. Yet this, if we understand it, is all the spiritual medium does. He claims no exalted rank in creation; he affects no sanctity; he pretends to no powers; he does not even present himself as an ambassador. What he does people might, if suitably "developed," do equally well for themselves. The function of the medium is altogether incidental and occasional.

It cannot much longer be concealed that Spiritualism and Christianity are at war; a few are brave enough now to avow it. But the many, the thousands and tens of thousands who still hold places in Orthodox churches, thinking their belief compatible with the form of Evangelical faith which they prefer, have yet to perceive the radical antagonism between the first principle of the new faith they welcome and that of the old faith to which their associations cling. The perception, when it comes, must compel them to let one faith or the other go; and so dear are the interests of just thought, that we hold it to be the duty of all clear seers to dispel the mists and vapors as much as possible. It is with genuine sadness that we see teachers confounding distinctions and confusing judgments. Words are not counters the value whereof is assigned by the intellectual gamester; they are coins, of value more fixed and permanent than that of gold and silver. The substance of them is thought. They stand for rational facts that must be weighed and appreciated. We speak of calling things by their right names. It is quite as important that names should be called by their right things. The prime duty of all thinkers is to weigh their words. The man in a recent audience who requested the speakers when using the word "God" to state exactly what they meant by it, was less impertinent than he seemed.

LONDON LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I was much gratified to notice your spirited and well-deserved rebuke of the Rev. James U. Mitchell for his pitiful attack upon the Jews.

In this country such language as he uses would not be tolerated for a moment. Never were the Jews more respected and honored than they are now, and what is so remarkable about their position is that they have won it for themselves. Quite unaided by advocacy or partisanship, they have established their claim not only to the rights of citizenship, but also to many of its honors—most of all to the confidence and gratitude of their fellow-citizens.

There has not been one hair's breadth of their religious position surrendered; not one inch have they advanced towards the Christian territory; not a suspicion of "conversion" or "perversion" has been at the bottom of their recent promotion. It has all been due to our having simply opened our eyes to the fact that the Jews are our best citizens already; that they furnish the smallest proportion of our criminals; that they are among the most peaceful and amiable of our neighbors; that they do really care for and maintain their own poor; that their charity is not to be matched by any Gentile community; and, lastly, they do not bear ill-will and malice against the children of those who tormented and persecuted them. The old reproach of "Oriental revenge" no longer applies, if it ever did apply, to their race.

My object, however, in writing to you about them is not to speak pleasant things of them, though that is a laudable reaction after the cruel and unjust revilings which the "followers of Christ" have cast in their teeth. But I am desirous of pointing out certain facts relating to the Jews of the period, and showing the bearings of those facts upon the great body of religious free-thinkers.

Both in England and on the Continent of Europe—and, I doubt not,—in America also,—there is a great mental agitation going on amongst the Jews. They have been touched by the Zeit-Geist like ourselves, and are awakening to an entirely new epoch of religious thought and feeling. It is the old story of the examination of the claims made by authority, followed by an assertion of individual right to think, to form opinions, and to frame one's cultus in accordance with one's own moral and spiritual instinct.

The Jews are thus divided into two sections (without any outward schism or rupture). 1st. Those who hold the Divine origin of the law and the truth of the Mosaic miracles; and, 2d. Those who have given up that entirely—simply accept the bare outline of fact which must lie as a substratum beneath all their traditions—and accept the main teaching of Judaism in its theology and morality, because it appears to them agreeable to reason.

Such a fundamental change of principle, however, does not necessitate much divergence of practice and ritual. The Jew has a duty to perform to the rest of his people—not to cast aside all the ceremonies, etc., which have kept them distinct among the nations; and so it is not incumbent upon him to withdraw himself from the congregation and synagogues because of his more rational views.

But, on the other hand, his altered views not only permit, but require, him to court the sympathy of men of all religions who have arrived at similar conclusions to his own; he therefore does not scruple to attend theistic places of worship, where the liturgy conforms to the spirit, and is largely composed of the very words, in which his own best religious thoughts have been clothed for so many centuries. In fact, there is an alliance springing up between Jews and such theists quite spontaneously, and free from any compromise on either side.

Should your readers have access to the London Jewish Chronicle, or Jewish World, they will see at once how the tide is flowing, and detect in the very efforts made to turn it the latent sense of hopelessness on the part of the more orthodox.

Before long, independent efforts will be made by the most advanced Jews to bring the truths, which they so dearly prize, before the minds of the non-Jewish communities among whom they live.

I, for one, shall welcome such an auxiliary as that in drawing attention to those conclusions of natural religion which seem likely to be thrust into a corner, in all the hubbub of the times. I think it would be an evil day for the principles of THE INDEX, when it should come to be regarded as a retrogression, or an impertinence, for an honest believer to give utterance to his belief. We at present stand on common and impregnable ground when we declare our purpose to be wholly true to ourselves, to express our real convictions, and to be equally ready to listen to each other. This I take to be our charter, and the very raison d'être of THE INDEX; and, therefore, as one of its best friends, I could wish to see more prominence given to those reasonable, and as yet not disproved, assurances of the human soul respecting the wisdom and love of God, which many persons feel and more would express but through a false delicacy and a timid deference to an overbearing atheism.

Surely, if it be competent in one to think of that conglomerate of forces which have produced the universe and ourselves, I have a right to say that "It" or "He" is not a potato, nor a horse, nor a man. No one will quarrel with me for giving utterance to such palpably reasonable assertions; then why quarrel with me if I go through some human attributes and likewise deny that "It" or "He" can possess them? But, remember, the same reasoning or conscientious faculty which enables me to say God is not a liar, nor impure, nor selfish, nor unjust, etc., gives me the power to discern that He is the opposite of these. I grant that it is not the same as demonstration; but it is a balance of probabilities, and where the scale so plainly predominates on the side of God being at least as good as the best of his creatures, or subordinates, it is somewhat unfair to meet the expression of this belief with ridicule, or with a scarcely less scornful pity.

Let us then welcome the Jew, the enlightened, emancipated Jew, as one who will bring to a desperate and determined minority that timely support which may help to lift the dark clouds of atheism, and to bring the sunshine of true faith and hope into the hearts which are well-nigh frozen among the icebergs of materialism.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
CHARLES VOYSEY.

LITERARY JUDGMENTS. By W. R. Greg. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1873.

For more than twenty years the name of William Rathbone Greg has been associated with one of the best treatises in behalf of free thought that has as yet issued from the press, the Creed of Christendom,—a work of the utmost delicacy and truthfulness of feeling as well as singular intrepidity of scholarship. Quite recently his Enigmas of Life has arrested the attention of the whole literary world by the boldness and crystalline sincerity with which it handles the questions that touch the human heart most profoundly and universally. Now the same author sends forth a collection of detached essays which, though quite miscellaneous in character, carry the marks of equal ability, equal culture, and equal moral earnestness. They are models of criticism in many respects, both as respects vigor and elegance of style, and also the sobriety, justice, and penetration of the judgments passed on the world's celebrities. The moral element in the book must command the sympathy of every appreciative reader, being of the healthiest description and totally free from the affectations of moralism; while the information imparted, the analyses made, and the characters sketched, render the book as instructive as it is enjoyable. Especially interesting are the accounts of Madame de Staël, her upright father, Necker, and her brilliant associates, Talleyrand and Benjamin Constant; of de Tocqueville, the profoundest and purest of Frenchmen; of Chateaubriand, the monkey of genius; and of Kingsley and Carlyle, running a race with each other in the denunciation of evils. The essay on "French Fiction: The Lowest Deep," in which the demoralization of French literature in the hands of Eugène Sue, Dumas (pere et fils), Paul de Musset, and Ernest Feydeau, is painted with an honest English wrath perhaps a little intensified by latent antagonism of race, should be read in connection with "British and Foreign Characteristics," in which generous appreciation is accorded to Emile Souvestre's touching little pictures of the better side of French life. The strong ethical interest of the writer, conspicuous on almost every page, is especially so in the essay on the "False Morality of Lady Novelists," which is handled in the spirit of one who is at once moralist and man of the world; and even more so in the essay on "Truth versus Edification." The wretched distinction of exoteric and esoteric is defended by Matthew Arnold, who condemns the publication of such a book as Bishop Colenso's work on the Pentateuch, on the general ground that no treatise on such subjects should be published except "to inform the instructed or to edify the uninstructed,"—as if it were not precisely the uninstructed who most need information! Mr. Greg makes too much of a concession when he says [page 312]: "The young, the ignorant, and the uncultured masses, who seek only moral guidance and spiritual consolation and support, should be fed with what St. Peter terms the 'sincere milk of the Word' rather than with 'doubtful disputations.'" It is quite time to drop forever the notion that the uncultured masses can be put off with "moral guidance," when so many thousands of them are thirsting for sound knowledge and exact ideas. But Mr. Greg goes on to plead vigorously for the enlightenment of the people, and maintains that to destroy superstitious dogma is to "edify" the people in the best sense: "Can he [Mr. Arnold] not perceive that Colenso is laboring to win legally, publicly, and for all, that acknowledged right of separating God's truth from man's assertion which Mr. Arnold, per saltum, by lawless assumption, in his secret soul, and in his locked closet, has won for himself alone?" Mr. Greg cannot but gain many new friends by this excellent, entertaining, and high-toned volume. F. E. A.

THE STORY OF GOETHE'S LIFE. By George Henry Lewes. Boston: James R. Osgood & Co. 1873.

This is an abridgment of Lewes' two-volume Life and Works of Goethe, made by Lewes himself to meet the wants of readers who are not sufficiently acquainted with German literature to find either profit or entertainment in the numerous criticisms contained in the larger work. It gives the history of Goethe's life in a very engaging manner, with enough of literary information to make the great poet's career and general course of development intelligible. Mr. Lewes treats his subject with an evident desire to be just, yet with a degree of enthusiasm that sometimes seems to carry with it a suspicion of undue partiality. The story of great genius is always fascinating in the extreme, furnishing even to people of ordinary talents one of the most instructive of lessons; and the preëminent greatness of Goethe in this respect can be questioned by no one. Yet his character as a man is not one to excite profound sympathy, or to command the admiration which is the involuntary homage paid to all signal disinterestedness. While he was capable of genuine and unobtrusive kindness to individuals, as in the case of Kraft,—while he could be roused to a generous indignation against wrongs inflicted on individuals, as in the case of the indignities heaped by Napoleon on the Grand Duke Karl August, it still remains true that his supreme interest was centered in himself, and that he showed little or none of that magnificent self-identification with humanity at large which is the necessary condition of being loved and revered by humanity in return. Especially in his relations with women, to whom he was never wholly true, he manifested a degree of smallness and egotism which forbids immunity from blame. Even Mr. Lewes is obliged to confess that—"Had Goethe never written Faust, no one would have heard that he was an inconstant lover and a tepid politician. His glory immortalizes his shame." Such a confession in part convicts his biographer of a certain inconsistency when he attributes to him "a self-mastery of the very highest kind;" and a painful absence of the truly admirable forces itself upon the mind, when we are told that Goethe could feel a "grand enthusiasm" for the "personality of the hero," but none for the cause in which the heroism was displayed. But, with all his failings, there is much in the life of Goethe to justify the admiration expressed for him by Lewes. His friendship for Schiller, his great rival, was magnanimous and pure; his attachment to Karl August was constant and real; his patient pursuit of culture, even if not illumined by the conscious dedication of it to human welfare, was worthy of all honor. The "many-sidedness" of his mind, which made literature, art, and science equally the objects of his activity, and prevented the narrowness of development characteristic of most men, must never be left out in the estimate of his true place in the pantheon of genius. Poet and artist though he was by nature, he was far too great to feel the poor jealousy of science which is the usual accompaniment of inability to appreciate it; he was preëminently a thinker, and, although mathematics was alien to his taste and capacity, he has left enduring traces of himself in the history of science by making illustrious discoveries in different branches of it. His optical theory (Farbenlehre) was a mistake; but botany owes to him the doctrine of the metamorphosis of plants, anatomy the vertebrate theory of the skull and the discovery of the intermaxillary bone in man. Vieq d'Azzyr shares the glory of this last discovery, and C. F. Wolff that of the metamorphosis of plants; but Goethe's name is justly and universally associated with both. It was his sympathetic tendency, his profound and irresistible impulse to view Nature as a great whole, that led his mind to these magnificent and illuminating facts; and supercilious allusions to "plodding science" and its "want of insight" look sorry enough in the light of such a career as Goethe's. In him the creative intuition of the poet and the patient induction of the scientist were harmonized and united; and whoever imagines any necessary antagonism between them betrays his own ignorance and one-sidedness. Under this aspect the life of Goethe is a needed lesson to our age; and in Mr. Lewes it has found a skilled and fascinating narrator. F. E. A.

"IMPROPER ADVERTISEMENTS."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

At the head of your advertising columns, readers of your paper are duly notified that—"No improper advertisements, no advertisements of patent medicines, and no advertisements known to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be hereafter admitted into THE INDEX."

This is quite as it should be, and is a worthy example for the proprietors of the special organ of Free Religion to set for the benefit of the more pharisaical members of the journalistic profession, whether religious or secular. It is likewise made clearly apparent that it is solely the province and duty of the editor to determine what advertisements are, and what are not, "improper" and "fraudulent or unjust," by the farther insertion of a clause in the contract with Mr. Butts, stipulating your general supervision of the advertisements in the following words—"No advertisements objectionable to the editor to be taken."

It follows logically that the editor of THE INDEX indorses as unobjectionable in purpose and character every advertisement which appears within its columns, and voluntarily becomes responsible to the good taste and consciences of his subscribers for his exercise of authority in the case of all advertisements admitted.

As a constant and delighted reader of your truly valuable paper, and one who sincerely desires its permanent success, as well as that of the noble cause it advocates so boldly, I wish to record my very respectful but most earnest protest against the assistance of the circulation of THE INDEX being given to aid in the moral contamination of our homes and firesides by disseminating the "Prospectus" of Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly; containing, as it does, among many other absurd and impracticable ideas, the following grossly immoral and irreligious proposition toward the creation of "a new government":—

"A new sexual system in which mutual consent, entirely free from money or any inducement other than love, shall be the governing law, individuals being left to make their own regulations; and in which society, when the individual shall fail, shall be responsible for the proper rearing of children."

Any "sexual system" in which "individuals" shall be "left to make their own regulations" would speedily reduce mankind to a level with the brute beasts, inasmuch as the primal unit of all civilizations, in every age and country, has ever been, and must ever continue to be, the permanent home, which could not exist but for the equal permanence and durability of the marriage relation. However vague and specious may be the language quoted above, it is not open to doubt as to the precise end and object it seeks to accomplish; and I respectfully deny the moral right of any journal to lend its countenance to the immorality so audaciously urged by the publication before mentioned.

The unanswerable argument against the demoralized or insane advocates of the abolition of marriage is that any system which does not permit of an enduring family relation, where the indispensable and reciprocal influence of a father and a mother can be continuously and harmoniously exerted in forming the habits of children from infancy to adult age, will produce instant and terrible degradation (among women especially), leading to infanticide by throwing upon the females the entire responsibility of supporting the offspring by their own unaided exertions. How many men would be willing to harbor and protect children by their hearth and fireside whose paterfamilias was doubtful or even alien to them? If men will not consent to do this as individuals, there is surely small hope of their taxing themselves collectively to support a system outside of the ties of blood and natural affection, "in which society, when the individual shall fail, shall be responsible for the proper rearing of children!"

If a journal with any claim to respectability consents to assist in extending the nefarious influence of these foes to society, civilization, and true progress, would it not be wiser not to pretend to exercise unusual supervision over its advertisements, and thus acquit its subscribers, at least, from any suspicion of being accomplices? What more "improper" advertisement could be admitted, or indeed offered? What "patent medicine" could begin to do the harm to the community at large that Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly proposes to accomplish? And, if the "Prospectus" herein alluded to, is not "known to be fraudulent and unjust" in its impudent devices for reforming society by deforming the minds of the rising generation and debauching the purity of womanhood, by breaking down every safeguard and barrier that the experience of countless generations and the thoughtful observation of the wisest of mankind has invented, we may expect to hear next that it is easier for a gnat to swallow a camel than for an editor to exclude paying advertisements on account of their character.

I remain, with sincere regret, your indignant subscriber,
ALBERT WARREN KELSEY.
SAINT LOUIS, December 1, 1873.

[There is nothing in the above letter which is not received by us with the great respect to which it is justly entitled. To every such remonstrance we listen with the strictest attention, and with the sincerest desire to profit by counsel offered in such a spirit as that of Mr. Kelsey. In reply we wish to state a few facts.

1. By the terms of the contract, Mr. Butts promised to pay a fixed sum for the "two best advertising pages of THE INDEX." Whatever profit accrues from advertisements in those pages belongs to him, not to the Index Association. Whether they "pay" or not, is his concern alone. He solicits, obtains, and forwards the advertisements for these pages; and we are not even informed whether they pay or do not pay.

2. The "editor" is under obligation to insert all advertisements thus sent, except such as he judges to be "objectionable" in any sense. It is true that we must be held responsible for their admission; but, as all loss resulting from their rejection falls on Mr. Butts, we have endeavored to exercise the right of rejection with as scrupulous regard to his interests as if he had shown himself a friend to the paper and its editor,—giving him the benefit of all doubts as to the character of the advertisements sent.

3. While it is easy to decide at once on the character of most advertisements, there are others which seem to be on the border line between the admissible and the inadmissible; and here there is room for practical mistakes, even with the best intentions. Perhaps we were mistaken in the case complained of,—perhaps not: of this every one has a right to his own opinion. Suffice it to say that, after no little hesitation, we decided not to reject this particular advertisement; and that we were prepared to expect a difference of opinion on this point. To suspect any mercenary motive, however, would do us great injustice.

4. Whether correctly or incorrectly, we believe that Mrs. Woodhull's "purpose" is to foster what she herself considers a truer morality. As to the real immorality of the theory she advocates, we quite agree with Mr. Kelsey's opinion; but there is a wide difference between seeking to pander to vice for the sake of profit and seeking to establish a new moral theory for the sake of human welfare. We admitted her advertisement because we think that all who endeavor, or even profess, to advocate a higher morality should be accorded a fair and courteous hearing, on the ground that truth will protect itself better than we can protect it by suppressing free discussion.

5. It is not entirely just to say that we "indorse as unobjectionable" every advertisement we admit. If that were the case, we could not admit any in which we suspected the slightest exaggeration; in other words, we should have to reject almost all advertisements. Mr. Kelsey overlooks the standing announcement: "THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers." The admission of an advertisement merely indicates that we do not think it sufficiently "objectionable" to warrant rejection. This is a difficult matter to decide. We simply profess to do the best we can. If we err in judgment, we must bear the consequences. And we expect to be credited with upright intentions.—Ed.]

THE WICKEDNESS OF PROFITS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Since Mr. Abbot, in his reply of Nov. 20 to Mr. Fowler, affirms that "the protest against interest is a protest against all property whatever," and that we "would extinguish all property," as one of his "anti-interest friends" I would ask permission to say that, besides claims for free gifts, the only just claims to property arise from the inherent right of the individual to his or her personal energy, whether before or after its accumulation in material form. This principle, though destructive to interest and profit, would plainly not destroy property, but only false claims to it, as did the emancipation proclamation, and would secure property to its rightful owners.

Is it not interest and profit that denies the right of the "tree" to life by denying the right of the laborer to his own energy, as did the slave power?

Respectfully, WM. D. HEBERLING.

ATALISSA, IOWA, Nov. 28, 1873.

[John Smith, we will suppose, plants five bushels of corn in his field, and gathers a harvest of (say) one hundred bushels. John is very conscientious. He thinks he has a right to five out of the hundred bushels, as that was the principal he lent to Nature; and he thinks his actual labor in planting, hoeing, &c., is worth (say) forty-five bushels more. So he considers that fifty bushels pay him for his outlay and his labor. But he is perplexed as to the ownership of the other fifty bushels. It is profit or interest of one hundred per cent. on his total investment of capital and labor; it is not the product of his "personal energy" at all, but the product of Nature's energy alone; and he concludes that he has no right to what is the common property of mankind. When Peter Brown comes up and wants to buy these fifty bushels, John says he has no right to sell what is not his, and turns over the whole without pay. He sees he has no more right to make profit out of Nature than out of his fellow-men; the increase is the interest on the capital and labor he invested, and it is wrong to take interest; and the natural wealth which grows spontaneously out of the earth, and is in no sense the "accumulation in material form" of his own "personal energy," belongs as much to Peter as to himself. Seeing all this, John is very indignant with the farmers about him, who insist on making immense profits out of Nature and selling to the consumer what is as much the consumer's property as theirs; he says they are grasping capitalists, exacting a profit of one hundred per cent. from the hungry widow and orphan; he declares that the farmers are doing precisely what the usurer does, except that they charge a much higher rate of interest than the usurer ever dares to charge; and he wonders what difference there is between a monopoly of corn and a monopoly of land, when each is based on simple possession of what is really natural wealth free to all. Now John is evidently a very queer and unreasonable fellow in all this; but what shall we say to him nevertheless?—Ed.]

THE REPRODUCTIVENESS OF CAPITAL.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Your discussion of the interest question with Mr. Fowler and others has suggested some thoughts which, if not deemed intrusive, I should like to submit to your consideration. Mr. Fowler insists that taking interest ought not, in justice, to be allowed; that it is the cause of the extremes of riches and poverty among us. I take the ground that it is capital that is made to do this mischief—not interest—not money even. I will try to make this appear in as brief a manner as possible. Let us endeavor to get clear and accurate fundamental ideas, and then build on them. And first—what is the true idea of capital?

It is defined to be such wealth as is "necessarily consumed in the process of making other wealth." This is called reproductive consumption; such wealth mainly consists of tools and raw materials. To simplify, we will let tools (i.e. ploughs, harrows, spinning-jennies, sewing-machines, etc.) stand for capital; and then see what we can do towards making the rich richer, while money and its interest are wholly left out of the agencies. The natural tools for making property are brains and hands; and these natural instruments are found to exist, in the natural man, in different degrees of efficacy in different individuals. This is the way it works.

Suppose some men are cast upon an island—all intercourse with others cut off. With a very few bad old tools saved, they are, at the start, just able to keep alive, by working all the time. One of the number, with better head and hands, the gift of Nature, cultivates and plies them so intensely and skilfully as to be able, in time, to support himself and have one day in the week to spare. This he devotes to making other and better tools. In a given time, he has made a full set, and with these new and better tools he is now able to live and have three days in the week to spare. With half his time now given to tool-making, a second set is soon completed. This last set he cannot use himself, but one of his neighbors offers to give the proceeds of two days' work in the week for the use of them; the neighbor gaining, by this operation, one leisure day per week, the tool-maker two. The tool-maker has now at his command five days' work per week, after earning his living; and with this increased force, a third set of tools is soon turned out, and a second neighbor hires them upon the same terms. In quicker time still he now turns out another, and another—ten—fifteen—twenty—fifty—an hundred sets, and so on without limit, laying the whole colony in time under contribution; and here we have a young millionaire. Now, fully under way, he goes on easily doubling up and piling up productive capital into mountain heaps, while, at the same time, he has not only not wronged any one, but has actually increased the productive power and prosperity of all, and also initiated civilization.

In conducting this illustration I have endeavored to simplify and make the showing as plain as possible, by divesting the case of all non-essentials, but retaining and giving due consideration to everything essential. Have I not fairly made a young millionaire without using money or interest in any shape?

Now if we had introduced the money agency into these transactions it could only have superseded barter without changing results. If other men of native ability had sprung up and competed with the first—made or got possessed, by barter or money, of ploughs, and harrows, and wans, or shops, and tool-making tools, sewing-machines, spinning-jennies, etc.—and followed suit, this could only have operated to check a little without arresting the first man's accumulations. Now the essence of the whole thing lies in this:—

Capital has an inherent reproductive power, as distinct from the power of labor as the power of labor is distinct from the power of capital; and neither can reproduce wealth without the help of the other.

But here is the vast distinction—capital can be increased and owned to any extent; whereas the mere laborer cannot even double himself. If for every additional set of tools he could turn out a new pair of hands and head, and set them to work, he might keep pace with the capitalist; but he cannot.

The most essential quality which makes an article capable of being used as capital in the process of reproduction is, that by its use it increases the productive power of the laboring man—increases it enormously—ten—twenty—fifty—an hundred fold, and more. Yet Mr. Fowler is of the opinion that the laboring man is the sole producer of wealth, and should have it all! But if an inventor of a sewing-machine give its use to a tailor and so quadruple his (the tailor's) productiveness, is not the inventor entitled to a fair share of the increase? Well: now substitute owner for inventor, and the case is not altered.

By this time it may be thought I am in favor of the capitalist. Not a bit of it. The self-augmenting power of accumulated capital is absolutely frightful, and must in some way be checked. But as long as the Creator apportions his gifts among men unequally, varying from one talent to ten, there is a meaning in it, and this is one of the things so meant; but the evils (penalties) naturally resulting from overgrown estates is proof that he does not approve of it.

If the foregoing reasoning be correct, it will not be difficult, I think, to settle the interest question; so I leave the subject just here.

E. WALKER.

CINCINNATI, 282 Main Street.

[The necessary tendency of capital to reproduce itself is very lucidly illustrated by Mr. Walker; and we commend his article to the especial attention of those interested in the discussion of the labor question in general. Natural inequality of talents is at the bottom of the unequal distribution of wealth, though this is largely increased by rascality and unwise social arrangements. Let us rectify all that can be rectified, without deluding ourselves with the hope of abolishing the natural inequalities of men.—Ed.]

RELIGION DEFINED.

BOSTON, Dec. 8, 1873.

DEAR FRIEND:—

You ask for definitions of "Religion" from your various friends and correspondents. It is audacious to tread the ground already measured by yourself and such a thinker as Samuel Johnson; but with the hope that the weakness of my statement will provoke some stronger ones, I send you this:—

Religion is three-fold; Sentiment, Idea, Action.

As Sentiment, it is the intuitive feeling of alliance with the infinite.

As Idea, it forms conceptions of the mode of that alliance, sees Law, which is the union of the finite with the infinite, and recognizes duty.

As Action, it is conscious effort to make that union complete.

ANTI-FASHION CONVENTION.

In view of the indifference of woman to the pressing demands of the hour; and believing it to be the result of her absorption by fashions of dress which are destructive to physical health, mental vigor, and moral power; and being convinced that she cannot make a successful demand for the full equality which Nature bestowed, but man has denied her, until she accumulates power by the use of that now within reach; and hoping by discussion and concert of action to encourage some in the adoption of a natural system of dress, one comporting with all the duties of woman, we invite lovers of truth to meet in convention in Plum Street Hall, Vineland, New Jersey, on Tuesday and Wednesday, January 20 and 21, 1874. As an important aid in the work proposed, we respectfully urge that every woman who can, come to the Convention in such costume as may best express her thought of a national dress for woman.

WHEN THE DEVIL finds us in the wilderness, and single-handed meets us, the devil alone and we alone, he is not much of a devil, he is not hard to put to rout. But the great temptation of the devil is when he is backed by interest or fashion, and meets us not alone but in the crowd. The devil who lies in ambush under the counter, who skulks behind a bale of cotton, or rings money in your ear, or rustles gay garments,—that is the dangerous devil, and fortunate is he who sees him fall as lightning from heaven. Nay, that is the kind that goeth not forth but by manly prayer and manly work.—Theodore Parker.

EUCHRE seems to be one of the oldest of games with cards. An instance is recorded in Scripture where the Levite "passed" and the good Samaritan "assisted."

Cultured Free Thought.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

OFFICE NO. 1 TREMONT PLACE, BOSTON,

has been organized with a capital stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND dollars, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books, and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, assisted by ABRAHAM W. STEVENS, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, Newport, R.I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, London, Eng.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still: "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.00 for one year, or 75 cents for three months on trial.

INDEX TRACTS.

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, by F. E. Abbot, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." MR. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used: "I have now read 'TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, by O. B. Frothingham, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of England, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. Abbot, is an exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution, by Rev. Arthur B. Bradford, opposes the proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury, denounces Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. Abbot, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. Frothingham, treats of a subject that interests everybody. New Edition. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. Abbot, shows the dangerous character of the attempt to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 10.—The Impoachment of Christianity, by F. E. Abbot. Fourth Ten Thousand. Sent for free distribution to any one who will distribute it, in packages of from five to one hundred copies.

No. 11.—The God of Science, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show the real influence of modern science upon the idea of God. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 12.—Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two essays by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00.

No. 13.—On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. F. W. Newman, of England, analyzes the Christian conception of Heaven. Price 5 cents; 12 copies 50 cents.

No. 14.—A Study of Religion: The Name and the Thing, by F. E. Abbot, attempts to show that the popular derivation of the word Religion is incorrect; that the popular conceptions of Religion itself are inadequate; and that a new conception of it, based on the Law of Evolution, consistent with absolute Freedom of Thought, and independent even of belief in God, is the necessary condition of the perpetuity of Religion among men. Price 10 cents; 12 copies $1.00. Address

--Morals.--Religion.--Philosophy.

APPENDIX: Scientific Evidence, containing Notes, Explanations, and additions of the text.

"This work, from its bold premises, and sweeping conclusions, will certainly be regarded as startling, in its defiance of received opinions."--Liverpool Advertiser.

"Whatever may be one's opinion as to the extreme views of the author, no one can read
his book without feeling that he is in the presence of a man of fine intellect and of wide culture."--Daily Bristol Times.

"The important questions--'Whence do we come?' 'What are we?' and 'Where are we going?' are discussed by the author, and it is not the least of the merits of his work that to each of these questions a distinct and intelligible, if not wholly convincing, answer is given."--Scotsman.

"The most conspicuous merits of this volume are its terseness and its freedom from unpleasant dogmatism. It states with fairness the arguments which have been adduced
in opposition to those which it supports."-- Illustrated Review.

"This author's views have all the force and lucidity which flow from the entire consistency and simplicity."--Medical Times and Gazette.

"We approve of the effort to introduce into our language so fearless and out-spoken and honest a labor as that which Dr. Büchner has performed. The book contains nothing that will be new to those who have followed minutely anthropological science for the past ten years, though it certainly contains, in a pithy and masterly style, everything that has been achieved by the English and foreign scientists in that space of time; but to the general reader it offers a masterly summary of the facts, reflections, and ultimate conclusions that have been put forward in regard to Man's origin."--Popular Science Review.

"Dr. Büchner has the gift of easy exposition. His generalities are put with preserving neatness; his well-selected examples clinch them hard, and just in the right place."
--Nature.

"He is eminently judicial, weighing carefully and fairly the arguments for and against,
and delivering judgment after independent investigation."--Public Opinion.

Force and Matter. By Dr. Büchner.
Latest authorized edition. 12mo. Cloth.
$2.50.

N.B.--The day after we announced the
we received such overtures from Messrs.
Asher & Co. and Messrs. Tribner & Co., London publishers of above works, as induced us to withdraw them from the hands of the printer. We offer these English editions very much cheaper than they have ever been offered in America. The "Man" is now received, and the "Force and Matter" is expected by next steamer, together with a full invoice of English Free-Thought Works.

In place of the above we have put in the printer's hands two volumes of discourses by O. B. Frothingham, which we intend to bring out in fine style as early next year as possible. Volume I. entitled

THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

This standard Family Magazine begins its fourth volume with the January number. Its leading object is to teach the SCIENCE OF LIFE, which includes all that relates to the Art of Preserving and Recovering Health, and promoting a higher physical and mental condition of a true manhood. It will be the exponent of every means by which health may be preserved, strength of body and mind increased, life prolonged, and disease removed.

HOW TO RETAIN HEALTH.—It is better and cheaper to preserve health by obeying the LAWS OF LIFE, than to regain it when once lost. Learn to avoid the CAUSES of disease, which one can do by reading carefully THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH for 1874.

DISEASE AND ITS TREATMENT.—The true theory of disease will be considered by competent writers, and philosophical and practical methods of treatment will be given on Hygienic Principles.

Invalids should read THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH regularly, and learn the nature of their diseases, and the methods prescribed for self-treatment and cure, where this is possible, which, in a majority of cases, have been and must continue to be successful.

"Doctors' bills" can easily be saved in many families; enough to pay for ten times the subscription price of THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH every year, by simply following its plain teachings. To know how to treat any complaint satisfactorily without calling in a physician is a great gain.

HEALTH OF WOMAN.—It is a lamentable fact that many women in this country are in ill health. The wives and daughters of business men, professional men, and even of farmers, are suffering in one way or another, and strange as it may seem, those who should be strongest—those in the country—suffer the most. This comes not so much from overwork, as from a violation of the most simple Laws of Life and Health, which would in large measure have been avoided by following the teachings of THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH.

It is a Family Magazine, as every number is devoted largely to domestic interests: considering the health and needs of women, and especially the physical wants of children. It will tell with minuteness how to feed, clothe, and care for the young, that they may be strong, vigorous, and healthy.

HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT—HEALTHFUL COOKERY.—We shall publish a series of valuable articles on "Seasonable Dishes," written expressly for this Magazine. In the same department will be given an amount of information, in short, brief paragraphs, always so popular and useful, worth in themselves the price of the Magazine.

Teachers are interested in THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. It will enable them to understand the laws affecting the mental and physical condition of themselves and pupils, and make teaching a delight, instead of the drudgery that so many find it now to be.

TALKS WITH CORRESPONDENTS.—This is one of the most interesting features of the Magazine. Here questions (of general interest only) are answered, from subscribers in all parts of the world, a single number containing information which it would take a whole library to convey in any other way.

AN INDEPENDENT JOURNAL.—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH is not the organ of any person or institution, but an independent, earnest teacher of the laws of life and health, published in the interests of the people, and not an exponent of any man's practice or profession.

TERMS: Monthly, $2.00 a year; sample number, 20 cents; three months free to all who subscribe now for 1874. Most liberal premiums offered for Clubs. For terms, address S. R. WELLS, Publisher, 389 Broadway, New York.

VOICES!

THE VOICES!

THE THREE VOICES!

WITH SPLENDID PORTRAIT ON STEEL OF THE AUTHOR,

WARREN SUMNER BARLOW.

"The fact that this work has rapidly passed through FIVE LARGE EDITIONS is sufficient evidence that the book possesses merit. It would be difficult for us to speak too highly of these poems. We have ever since their first publication constantly endorsed them as one of the very BEST AND MOST EFFECTIVE MEANS with which to BATTLE ERROR that can be used. The work contains food for all. The philosopher peruses page after page with increasing zest and wonderment, finding therein new ideas, sound logic, and the most elevated reason, dressed in elegant and beautiful or sharp and pungent language, as the theme requires. The devout religionist can here find new and sublime ideas of his 'Heavenly Father,' while the fabulous God of old theology is held up in all his hideous deformity."

"The work clearly shows MAN has ever made a God in his image, and has conceived him to be in harmony with his (man's) own development. Hence, when man saw only through his own nature, his God was blood-thirsty and combative."

"High authorities assert that some of the most difficult questions have been rendered plain in this remarkable book. For instance, the sovereignty of God and the free agency of man for the first time reconciled."

"No person, whatever may be his religious belief, can read these poems without benefit."—The Religion-Philosophical Journal.

ATTRACTIVE NEW BOOKS.

Threading my Way.

Or, Twenty-seven years of Autobiography by Robert Dale Owen, author of that remarkable able work, which is having such an enormous sale, entitled the "Debatable Land between this World and the Next."

This new work is a most fascinating one. It is a narrative of the first twenty-seven years of the author's life; its adventures, errors, experiences; together with reminiscences of noted personages whom he met forty or fifty years since, &c., &c.

"All Mr. Owen's chapters are remarkable, not only for the attractiveness of the incidents, but for the light shed on many important social and industrial movements, and for the noble sincerity and good humor pervading them." A beautifully printed and bound volume. Price $1.50.

Fanny Fern.

A Memorial volume by James Parton; containing short biography of Mrs. Parton ("Fanny Fern") and a selection from the very best and most popular of her writings. Beautifully printed and bound, with illustrations by Arthur Lumley. A charming volume for the Holidays. Price $2.00.

Jessamine.

Another splendid new novel, by Marion Harland, author of "True as Steel," &c. Price $1.50.

Old Curiosity Shop.

The eighth volume of "Carleton's New Illustrated Edition" of CHARLES DICKENS' WORKS (the best, cheapest, and handsomest edition in the world). Printed from new, readable type; exquisitely illustrated by the original artists chosen by Dickens himself; handsomely bound, and sold at $1.50 per volume.

A Wonderful Woman.

An intensely interesting new novel by May Agnes Fleming, author of "Guy Earleheart's Wife." Price $1.75.

Bill Arp's Peace Papers.

A new comic book by the great Southern humorist, "Bill Arp," who gives us, in a series of irresistibly funny, satirical papers upon War, Politics, and our Domestic Relations, one of the sharpest books ever printed in this country. Full of comic pictures. Price 1.50.

THE WONDERFUL NEW INVENTION.

THE CABINET PIPE ORGAN,

(only perfect combination of Pipe and Reed Organ) has been placed in the market at cheaper rates, newer styles, and greatly improved actions, and as various manufacturers and dealers of the common reed organ are misrepresenting to the public the liability of the Cabinet Pipe Organ to get out of tune, we hereby guarantee the perfection of the organ, and offer our warrant that they will remain in tune equally with any reed organ, and are not affected by change in the atmosphere.

OPINIONS OF MUSICAL JUDGES.

George W. Morgan, the great organist—"An indispensable improvement over all Reed Organs."

J. R. Thomas, organist and composer—"One of the most valuable musical inventions of our time."

J. E. Buckton, organist at the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Manchester, England—"In my opinion the best Cabinet Organ in the world."

Albert W. Berg, the distinguished organist and composer—"This remarkable organ I consider something entirely by itself, and something above all competition from anything now known."

Churches, Schools, Musicians, and families should not fail to examine this organ before buying anywhere, as it is a complete revolution in Cabinet Organs.
